

UNIVERSITY OF TORONTO

3 1761 01308951 1

Digitized by the Internet Archive in 2008 with funding from Microsoft Corporation

ROUTE FROM

BAGDAD to SULIMANIA,
SINNA, NINEVEH & MOUSUL

AND FROM TRENYCE DOWN THE TIGRIS TO BAGDAD

FROM ACTUAL SURVEY

ADJUSTED BY NUMEROUS ASTRONOMICAL OBSERVATIONS

By Claudius James Rich Esq^r

Scale of English Miles

° Mendi

34°

16°

47°

Drawn and Engraved by J.A.C. Walker

HAS
R 1982 n

NARRATIVE OF A
RESIDENCE IN KOORDISTAN, AND ON THE
SITE OF ANCIENT NINEVEH; WITH JOURNAL OF
A VOYAGE DOWN THE TIGRIS TO BAGDAD AND AN ACCOUNT OF A VISIT TO SHIRAUZ AND PERSEPOLIS.

BY THE LATE
CLAUDIUS JAMES RICH, ESQ^{RE}

THE HON. EAST INDIA COMPANY'S RESIDENT AT BAGDAD, Author of "An Account of Ancient Babylon."

EDITED BY HIS WIDOW.

TWO VOLUMES.—VOL. I.

LONDON:
JAMES DUNCAN, PATERNOSTER ROW.
MDCCCXXXVI.

389306
26.2.41

LONDON:
Printed by W. CLOWES and SONS,
Stamford Street.

CONTENTS OF VOLUME I.

	PAGE
Notice respecting the Maps	ix
Preface	xi
Brief Notice of the Life of Mr. Rich	xv

CHAPTER I.

Departure from the Residency—Manner of travelling—Description of our Party—Thunder-storms—Kifri—Sassanian Ruins—Beiat Chief's Hospitality—Naphtha Springs at Toozkhoormattee.	1
---	---

CHAPTER II.

Departure from Toozkhoormattee—The Valley of Leilan—Yusuff Aga's camp—His hospitality—Entrance into Koordistan—Cultivation and appearance of the country—Present of provisions from the Pasha of Sulimania—Arrival at our camp before Sulimania—Visit of the Pashas—Of Koordish gentlemen.	35
--	----

CHAPTER III.

Osman Bey—Entrance into Sulimania—Visit to the Pasha—Description of our House—Attachment of the Koords to their Chiefs—Anecdotes—Partridge Fighting—Afghans in Shehrizoor—Xenophon and the Ten Thousand.	76
--	----

CHAPTER IV.

Conversation with the Pasha—Kai Khosroo' Bey—Koordish Tribe of the Jafs—Climate of Sulimania—Breakfast with the Pasha—Population of Sulimania—Firing at a Mark—Takhti Suliman—Ancient Excavations—Musical Party—The Zor Khaneh, or Gymnasium—Dinner at Osman Bey's—Oriental prayers—Suliman Bey—Feats of Swordsmanship—Agriculture—The Ramazan.	111
---	-----

CHAPTER V.

PAGE

Brave Russian Soldier—Cruelty of the Prince of Kermanshah—Great Mahometan Saint—Natural Productions of Koordistan—Piety of Mahmood Pasha—Anecdote—Abdullah Pasha arrested—The Bai- ram—Koordish Tribes—Anecdote—The Bulbassi Tribes—The reigning Families in Koordistan—Arrival of Delli Samaan with Antiques.	139
---	-----

CHAPTER VI.

Departure from Sulimania for the Mountains—The Pass of Giozheh— Tents pitched at Gherradeh—Beauty of the situation—Noise and bustle of loading—High Mountains—Vineyards—Corn—Beautiful Country—Officer of the Chief of the District of Kizzeljee—Laugh- able Equivoque—Steep Ascent—Sons of Khaled Bey—Cantonment at Ahmed Kulwan—Reapers singing the Tale of Ferhad and Shireen —Locusts—Temperature of Springs—Green Frogs—Curious Game —Leave Ahmed Kulwan—Journey to Beestan—Artificial Mounts— Unhealthiness of Beestan—Our People all taken ill—Leave Beestan —Penjween—Jaf encampments—Moving parties—Lady and her servants—Jews.	159
--	-----

CHAPTER VII.

Entrance into Persia—Lake of Zeribar—Kai Khosroo Bey—Jaf en- campment—Djereeding match—Cross Mount Zagros—Garran pea- santry—Inclement winter—Jaf quarrel—Sinna—Magnificent colla- tion—The palace—Tyranny of the Vali of Sinna—General mourning —Rebellion—Death of the Vali's son—Despair and cruelty of the Vali—Terror of his subjects—Change in our plans—Consternation of the Vali's ministers—Entreaties of the council—Are successful— Their joy and gratitude—Departure from Sinna for the camp of the Vali	195
--	-----

CHAPTER VIII.

Leave Sinna—Appearance of the Country—Tents of Gulaneh—The Koorde great politicians—The Kizzel Ozan River—Encampments— A Peasant's remark—Lawless conduct of the Jafs—Precipitous Road —Refreshments of Honey and Butter—Arrival at the Village of
---	--

CONTENTS.

	PAGE
Meek—Mrs. Rich taken on to another Village—Bee-hive—Rejoin Mrs. Rich—Present of Fruit from the Vali—Arrival at Bana—The
Vali's Son—Fine Fruit.	221

CHAPTER IX.

Visit to the Vali of Sinna—The Castle of Banna—Conversation of the Vali—Marriage of his Son—The Vali returns my visit—His cruelty at Banna—Preparations for our departure—Unexpected hindrances —Difficulty of obtaining Cattle—Vali's Apologies—The Sultan of Banna—Begin our march—Village Chief—Refuses to allow us to proceed on our journey—Disagreeable situation—Determine to fight our way—The Chief alarmed—Allows us to proceed—Mountains—Enter the Bebbeh Territory—Omar Aga's retainers—Ruins of
Karatcholan—Fine Fruit—Precipitous Hills—Arrival at Sulimania	242

CHAPTER X.

Failure of Vaccination—Death of Osman Bey's Son—Sorrow of the Pasha—Antiquities of Shehrizoor—Alexander the Great and the Indian Princess—Names of districts—Omar Aga—His persecutions and imprisonment—Attachment of his Followers—His disinterestedness—His dislike of Osman Bey—Rahmet ullah Tartar—His journey through the wild and inaccessible Mountains inhabited by the Chaldean Christian Tribes—Amadia—The Pasha's advice to the Tartar—His difficulties and dangers—Chaldean Cantonment—Rice-bread—Astonishment of the Chaldeans at the sight of Rahmet ullah—Their contempt for Mahommed—Yezids—Van—Names of Koordish Clans—Wedding feast—Ladies dancing—Condition of the Koordish Women—A Koordish Marfisa—Dress of the Men—
Tale of Darishmana—A Bebbeh Patriarch	268

CHAPTER XI.

The Pasha melancholy and depressed—His eldest Son sent a hostage to Kermanshah—Sickness of the youngest—Dissensions in his family—Ahmed Bey of Darishmana—Tribes of Rewandiz—Koordish funeral—Bebbeh family—Series of Bebbeh Princes—Death of Pasha's child by Small-pox—Affliction of the Pasha—Suliman
Bey—Commerce of Sulimania—Conversation with Osman Bey—
The Pasha's desire to abdicate—Omar Aga—His intelligence and

	PAGE
accuracy—Comparison between the Koords, the Turks, and the Persians—Lokman—Farewell visit to the Pasha—Religious conversation—Osman Bey ordered to his Government—Refuses to obey—Traits of Koordish character—Flight of the great Dervish Sheikh Khaled—Pasha's last visit to Mr. Rich—Interesting conversation—Pasha's grief for the loss of his Son—His character—Preparations for leaving Koordistan—Sorrow at bidding adieu to its interesting People	298

APPENDIX.

I. Fragment of a Journal from Bagdad to Sulimania, by Mrs. Rich	331
II. Information, collected from Natives, concerning Jezira and the adjacent Country	375
III. A Series of the Princes of the Bebbeh Family	381
Dates and Facts connected with the History of Koordistan	385
IV. Routes procured at different places	388
V. Particulars relating to the Topography of Koordistan	390
VI. Specimens of the Koordish Language, in various Dialects	394

DIRECTIONS FOR PLACING THE MAPS, PLANS, AND PLATES.

VOLUME I.

	PAGE
Route from Bagdad to Sulimania, &c.	to face Title
An Officer of the Pasha of Sulimania	67
A Man of the Jaf Tribe	112
Koordish Soldiers of Avroman	202
Koordish Marriage	282

VOLUME II.

Map of the Country between Sinna in Persian Koordistan, Arbil, and Mousul	to face Title
The City of Arbela	14
Plan of Nineveh opposite Mousul	29
Nineveh	34
A Yezid Man and Woman	85
Convent of Rabban Hormuzd	99
Nestorian Family	111
Bricks from Nimrod	131

NOTICE RESPECTING THE MAPS.

WITH respect to the Maps which accompany this Work, it has been considered necessary to give a brief description of their construction.

In the Map of Koordistan and the adjacent countries, the line of routes and all the detail were protracted, in the first instance, by Mr. Rich, from his bearings and distances; after which a considerable number of observations for latitude and longitude were put into our hands; having compared the differences of latitude that were determined by observation, with those which were protracted by Mr. Rich, they coincided with remarkable accuracy; and therefore required very little correction to adjust the positions by the observed latitudes. With respect to the longitudes, we have placed Sulimania in $45^{\circ} 27' 45''$, by mean of a great number of eclipses of Jupiter's satellites. We have selected this position in preference, because Mr. Rich made a great many more observations at Sulimania than at any other place in Koordistan; it was likewise the connecting point from which his routes either began or terminated. The differences of latitude by Mr. Rich's survey, having agreed so nearly with his observed latitudes, we have not hesitated to adopt his differences of longitude by his survey, in preference to those by celestial observation which he made in the course of his journey, because, in short distances, it is almost impossible to determine the difference of longitude with any degree of accuracy, by one or two observations.

In the small general Map, the position of Mousul and Sulimania are taken from that of Koordistan. The longitude of Bagdad has been determined by the mean of several sets of lunar distances, taken by Mr. Rich, and which have been calculated and worked by Mr. Coleman, and also by a great number of eclipses of Jupiter's satellites; the mean of the whole makes Bagdad in $44^{\circ} 25' 21''$. The latitude has been settled by the mean of a great number of observations. The river Tigris has been laid down from a minute survey by bearing and distance on a large scale by Mr. Rich, and adjusted by several observed latitudes between Mousul and Bagdad. In any map which could be brought within the compass of a book, it would not have been possible to give it on a scale sufficiently large to show the detail with which this survey has been executed; we have therefore contented ourselves with merely giving a general outline of it.* The routes between Bagdad and Sulimania have been laid down by bearing and distance, from Mr. Rich's Journal, and adjusted by several observations for latitude, in the course of his journeys.

J. WALKER.

* Mrs. Rich has allowed a copy of this Survey of the Tigris, on a large scale, to be made for the use of the East India Company.

P R E F A C E.

THE account of the Author which is contained in the following Introduction supersedes the necessity of any biographical notice in this Preface. For that account the editor is indebted to the kindness of a friend, who does not wish his name to be mentioned, and of whom, therefore, she will say no more, than that his personal knowledge of the subject, and his intimate interest in it, well qualified him for the office which at her request he undertook.

The volumes now submitted to the reader are all which exist of a work begun by Mr. Rich on a very extensive scale. He therefore applied himself diligently to the study of various scientific subjects, by the knowledge of which he hoped to accomplish his design. He felt that a very different book of travels in the East would be expected from one who had enjoyed so many advantages as himself, than could be claimed from the generality of travellers; for he had spent many years in Asia; he spoke several Asiatic languages fluently ; and he was intimately acquainted with the character and manners of the people. It will be found, accordingly, that he is evidently at home in the countries which he describes ; that his observations, being in his own mind the result of long experience, are not given as new discoveries, but as well ascertained facts ; and many allusions are made which indicate his intimacy with the feelings and habits of the country, but which will perhaps either appear obscure, or pass unheeded by those who may not be equally well acquainted with the subject. If he had been spared, and had himself published his materials, he would have added alike to their interest as to their bulk, by introducing very full details of his personal narrative, and of his daily intercourse with the people.

As it is, his papers now published record chiefly those particulars which he noted down at once, lest they should escape his memory, and the whole value of which depended upon their accuracy. These he would probably have compressed, after finishing his map, for the purpose of constructing which, he was thus minute in his observations on the face of the country, and other points connected with geography.

However, though these volumes are less filled up with the incidents which occurred in the journey, than would have been the case if they had passed from the author to the press, the Editor hopes that they will not be without their use. They in great part describe a country little visited by Europeans, and never, it is believed, described by any Englishman; and, in that view, if in nothing else, they will, it is hoped, repay the reader.

If it be asked why this work was not published sooner, the Editor can only answer that the delay arose from many circumstances, with the recital of which she need not trouble the world.

Under a deep consciousness of her own inability for such an undertaking, she long shrunk from attempting it, but she has been encouraged and cheered in her task by the sympathy and assistance of many kind friends, among whom she cannot forbear naming Sir R. H. Inglis, who, in the midst of his numerous avocations, spared no pains to make her work easy to her, and was always ready to afford her help and counsel.

Clapham, 5th March, 1836.

BRIEF NOTICE OF THE LIFE OF MR. RICH.

CLAUDIUS JAMES RICH, the writer of the following Journal, was born on the 28th of March, 1787, near Dijon in Burgundy : and while yet an infant, was carried to Bristol, where he spent the first years of his life under the eye of his parents.

At an early age he discovered a very extraordinary capacity. Even while passing through the usual course of instruction, the elements of the Latin and Greek tongues being taught him by a relation of his own, his active and successful curiosity led him to acquire several modern languages, without a teacher, and assisted only by books. When but eight or nine years old, having seen some Arabic manuscripts in the library of a gentleman at Bristol, he was seized with a strong desire to make himself acquainted with that language ; and this accident, which gave a particular impulse and direction to a passion that was already working in his mind, probably decided, more than any thing else, the bent of his studies towards oriental learning, and had a powerful influence on the whole current of his future life. By the help of a grammar and dictionary, and of some manuscripts lent him by Mr. Fox of Bristol, he not only learned to read and write that very difficult language, but to speak it with considerable ease and fluency. By the time he had attained his fifteenth year, guided by this decided bias which his mind had taken, and aided by unwearied application, he had made no mean progress in several oriental languages, and among others, the Hebrew, Syriac, Persian, and Turkish.

About this time, as he was taking an evening's walk on Kingsdown, near Bristol, he happened to meet a Turk, and being desirous of ascertaining whether his pronunciation of the Turkish were sufficiently correct to be understood by a native, he addressed him in that language. The Turk, after expressing his pleasure and surprise at being so unexpectedly accosted in his own tongue, informed him that he was a merchant, but was then in distress, having been recently shipwrecked on the coast of Ireland. Besides the satisfaction arising from his successful experiment, Mr. Rich had the still higher gratification of contributing to the stranger's relief.

His uncommon proficiency in a line of study so remote from the beaten road, excited the attention of those immediately around him. Mr. (afterwards Dr.) Marshman introduced him to Dr. Ryland, at that time a divine of eminence in the place : and he was enabled to cultivate the society of several other men of letters in Bristol, particularly of Mr. Fox, of whom he always spoke with peculiar affection and gratitude, and who, by his advice and the use of his library, essentially assisted him in the progress which he was now making in his favorite oriental studies. But although he drew attention chiefly from the unwonted direction which his studies had taken, and his success in prosecuting them, he was no less remarkable for his application to his general improvement; and even at this early period, was distinguished for his high and generous, and somewhat proud spirit, and for the ardour which he showed in every manly exercise and accomplishment.

The turn which his studies had taken naturally pointed out, both to himself and to others, India as the fittest scene for his future exertions. When the friend, through whose interest he was, in 1803, appointed to a cadetcy in the East India Company's military service, informed him of the nomination, and expressed his regret that he could not procure something better for him, Mr. Rich, who felt a just confidence in his own powers, exclaimed with delight, "Let me but get to India, leave the rest to me." The wide field which hitherto he had only contemplated in imagination, or at a distance, seemed now to be within his reach; and his mind was filled with all those bright visions which float before the eye of youthful hope. He hastened to London, and repaired to the India-House to complete the forms necessary to be observed before he received his appointment. It was at this period that the letter, of which the following is an extract, was written by the celebrated Robert Hall to his friend Sir James Mackintosh, which will show, better than anything else can, the impression which he had made, even at this early period, on those around him.

“ Shefford, near Cambridge, Dec. 30, 1803.

“ May I take the liberty, before I close, of recommending to your attention a young gentleman of the name of Rich, who is going out in the same fleet with you, as a cadet, to Bombay. He is of Bristol, where I had the pleasure lately of seeing him. He is a most extraordinary young man. With little or no assistance, he has made himself acquainted with many languages, particularly with the languages of the East. Besides Latin, Greek, and many of the modern languages, he has made himself master of the Hebrew, Chaldee, Persian, Arabic, and is not without some knowledge of the Chinese, which he began to decipher when he was but fourteen. He is now seventeen. He has long had a most vehement desire to go to India, with the hope of being able to indulge his passion for eastern literature ; and, after many difficulties, he has at length succeeded in being appointed to the situation of cadet. He is a young man of good family, and of most engaging person and address. His name, I believe I mentioned before, is Rich. If it is consistent with your views to honour him with your countenance, he will not, I am almost certain, give you any reason to repent of your kindness and condescension.”

While Mr. Rich was in attendance at the India-House, Mr. (now Sir Charles) Wilkins, so eminent for his knowledge of the languages of the East, had his attention called to the young cadet's acquirements in the oriental tongues, which on trial he found so much beyond any thing that he could have anticipated, and so extraordinary, compared with his means of attaining them, that he at once pointed him out to the Directors as a young person of such singular and rare talents, as would amply justify and do honour to any exertion of their patronage. On this representation of Mr. Rich's merits, a writership on the Bombay establishment was in the most honourable manner presented to him by the late Edward Parry, Esq., which changed his destination from the military to the civil branch of the service; and in order to enable him to perfect himself in the knowledge of the Arabic and Turkish languages, in which he had already made such unexpected progress, he was attached as secretary to Mr. Lock, who was at that time proceeding to Egypt as Consul-General; his rank, contrary to the usage of the service, being allowed to run on while he was in this occupation, in the same way as if he had at once repaired to India.

Mr. Rich, early in 1804, embarked in the Hindostan store-ship, to join Mr. Lock in the Mediterranean; but that vessel being by some accident burnt in the Bay of Rosas, he escaped with the crew to the coast of Catalonia ; whence, by the assistance of a friendly quaker of Bristol, he was enabled to make his way to Malta, after a residence of some length in Italy, where he perfected himself in the beautiful language of that country, and devoted himself to the study of music, an art which he ardently cultivated at every period of his life, and in which he took enthusiastic delight. Of all the countries that he ever visited, perhaps Italy was that most suited to the turn of his mind, and to which he looked back with the greatest pleasure. His amiable and accomplished friend Mr. Lock having died at Malta before entering on his mission, Mr. Rich was now allowed by the Court of Directors to follow such a course of travel as it was supposed might be most conducive to the object he had in view, in which he had the valuable advice of Mr. Wilkins. He therefore proceeded from Malta towards Constantinople, touching at several of the Greek islands by the way. While sailing up the Archipelago, a suspicious-looking vessel was one day observed bearing towards that in which he was a passenger. It was believed to be a pirate, and every thing was made ready for a desperate defence. On her nearer approach, however, she was discovered to be a Turkish merchantman, when Mr. Rich and several others went on board. He had not been long on the deck, when one of the Turks who was richly dressed, eyed him so steadfastly for some time as to excite his particular attention. At length the Turk addressed him, saying, "Sir, I know you." "And I," replied Mr. Rich, "have seen you before." An explanation followed. It was the man whom he had assisted when in distress at Bristol.

Mr. Rich remained for some time at Constantinople, and afterwards repaired to Smyrna, where, that he might thoroughly master all the niceties and peculiarities of speaking or writing the Turkish language, and gain an insight into the nature and extent of the acquirements of the Mussulmans in the various branches of learning, he put himself to school with the young Turkish students of his own age. At this period he made several interesting journeys in Asia Minor, when having been appointed for a time assistant to Colonel Missett, Consul-General in Egypt, he repaired, by way of Cyprus, to Alexandria. His residence in Egypt he employed in perfecting himself in the Arabic language and its various dialects; and he at the same time devoted his leisure to gaining that skill in horsemanship, and in the management of the scimitar and the lance, for which the Mamelukes were so remarkable. It is not surprising, that one, who, like him, to a manly deportment united the mildest manners, and the most lively and sportive wit, should have gained the esteem and affection of Colonel Missett, and of all the Franks within the circle of his acquaintance; or that when the object of his visit to that country was attained, and he was about to leave them, they saw his departure with regret. He resolved to make his way by land to the Persian Gulf, and leaving Egypt in the disguise of a Mameluke, he travelled over a great part of Palestine and Syria. Confiding in his knowledge of the Turkish language and manners, he ventured to visit Damascus while the great body of pilgrims were assembled there, on their way to Mecca, and to enter the grand mosque, an act which at that time would have proved fatal to any one known to be a Christian. His host, an honest Turk, who was captivated with his address, eagerly intreated him to settle at that place, offering him his interest, and his daughter in marriage. From Aleppo he proceeded by Mardin and Bagdad to Bussora, whence he sailed for Bombay, which he reached early in September, 1807.

We have seen that the Rev. Robert Hall had particularly recommended Mr. Rich to Sir J. Mackintosh, at the time when it was expected that they were to sail for India in the same fleet. When Mr. Rich's destination was changed, he had an opportunity, just before embarking in the Hindustan, of calling on Sir James, then at Ryde, waiting to embark for Bombay. A correspondence had ensued between them; and, on reaching Bombay, Mr. Rich went to reside with him. The sequel may be related in Sir James's own words, in a letter to a friend written at the time. "You may recollect, perhaps, to have read in the newspapers in 1803, that Mr. Parry, the present chairman, gave a writership here, to a young man of the name of Rich, merely on Mr. Wilkins's report of his extraordinary proficiency in Eastern languages, without interest, and, I believe, without even personal knowledge. He came out as assistant to young Lock, who was appointed Consul at Alexandria; and, since his death, has travelled over the greater part of Turkish Asia, in various directions, with the eye and pencil of an artist, and with the address and courage of a traveller among barbarians. He acquired such a mastery over the languages and manners of the East, that he personated a Georgian Turk for several weeks at Damascus, amidst several thousand pilgrims, on their way to Mecca, completely unsuspected by the most vigilant and fiercest Mussulman bigotry. He was recommended to me by my friend Robert Hall, and I had several letters from him. I invited him to my house; and at his arrival on this island, on the 1st of September, 1807, he came to us. He far surpassed our expectations; and we soon considered his wonderful oriental attainments as the least part of his merit. I found him a fair classical scholar, and capable of speaking and writing French and Italian like the best educated native. With the strongest recommendations of appearance and manner, he joined every elegant accomplishment and every manly exercise; and combined with them, spirit, pleasantry, and feeling. His talents and attainments delighted me so much, that I resolved to make him a philosopher; I even thought him worthy of being introduced into the Temple of Wisdom, by our friend Dugald Stewart; and when I went to Malabar, I left him at the house of my philosophical friend Erskine, busily engaged with the "Philosophy of the Human Mind." On my return, I found that this pupil in philosophy was desirous to become my son in law. He has no fortune, nor had he then even an appointment; but you will not doubt that I willingly consented to his marriage with my eldest daughter, in whom he had the sagacity to discover, and the virtue to value, the plain sense, modesty, purity, and good-nature, which will, I hope, make her a source of happiness to him during life.

"Soon after, the most urgent necessities of the public called for a Resident at Bagdad. He alone was universally acknowledged to be qualified for the station. He was appointed: having thus twice before he was twenty-four, commanded promotion by mere merit. They were married, and are gone to Bagdad."

In writing to Mr. Robert Hall about this time, he says, "Rich, whom you recommended to me, is become my son-in-law; and he is indeed a son-in-law to whom the fondest parent may gladly intrust his child."

Soon after his marriage, which took place on the 22nd of January, 1808, he set out for his Residency, which included Bagdad and Bussora, and took up his abode in the former city, as being the seat of the Pasha, and the spot best situated, both for managing the political business of the Pashalik, and for gaining intelligence of what was passing in Europe at that eventful period, when an invasion of British India was anticipated. His high spirit, his sound political views, his perfect knowledge of the native character, and his profuse generosity speedily gained him the highest reputation both with the local government and with the people. As is usual under the Turkish sway, there were many revolutions of the government, and changes of the Pasha, during the time of his residence there; and Mr. Rich's high character enabled him, sometimes under very uncommon circumstances, to give shelter in his tents to many who were in danger of their lives from these political reverses; and even, occasionally, to the family of the unsuccessful party, whom nothing could have preserved but an asylum which was never attempted to be violated. He had the satisfaction of seeing the effects of his uniform justice and good faith on all around him. The promises and engagements of their Pashas and leading men often were of no weight, till strengthened by his guarantee. He spent about six years at Bagdad with no European society but that of his wife and of Mr. Hine, the surgeon to the Residency, who was also his assistant. The leisure which he enjoyed from his public duties he spent in pursuing his favourite studies. He made collections for a history, and for a geographical and a statistical account, of the Pashalik of Bagdad. He curiously examined all the remains of antiquity within his reach; and commenced his collection of oriental manuscripts, which he spared no labour or cost to render complete. A catalogue of it, as it stood at the close of this period, may be found in several numbers of the "Mines de l'Orient," published at Vienna, and proves how successful he had already been in his researches. He also formed a rich collection of medals and coins, and of the gems and engraved stones found at Babylon, Nineveh, Ctesiphon, and Bagdad. He made an excursion to Babylon for the purpose of examining the remains of that ancient city. The fruit of his observation was his "Memoir on the Ruins of Babylon," first printed at Vienna, in the "Mines de l'Orient," and since reprinted in England. The "Edinburgh Review" justly described it as "a modest and perspicuous account of what he saw during a short visit,"—"creditably distinguished by abstinence from fruitless inquiry and rash conjectures, and in which the classical and oriental learning of the author is as much proved by the careful exclusion of false pretensions and impertinent display, as by the natural fruits of solid knowledge."

Major Rennell having, some time after (in 1816), published a paper in the "Archæologia," containing "Remarks on the Topography of Ancient Babylon, suggested by the recent Observations and Discoveries of Claudius James Rich, Esq.," in which he questioned some of his conclusions, Mr. Rich made another journey to Babylon, again to examine the situation of that place; and, in 1818, published, in London, a "Second Memoir on Babylon, containing an Inquiry into the correspondence between the Ancient Descriptions of Babylon and the remains still visible on the site, suggested by the 'Remarks of Major Rennell.'" In this "Second Memoir" he confirms the reasoning of the first, and adds a valuable appendix on Babylonian antiques, illustrated by engravings. These Memoirs have attracted an uncommon degree of notice all over Europe, from their throwing new light on a subject so interesting to every reader of sacred or of ancient history.

In the end of 1813 Mr. Rich was compelled, by bad health, to leave for a time the Residency of Bagdad in charge of his assistant, Mr. Hine; while he himself, accompanied by Mrs. Rich, travelled to Constantinople. Here he remained for some time with his friend Mr. (now Sir Robert) Liston, who was then Ambassador at the Porte. He was induced by various considerations, in the beginning of 1814, to prolong his journey through Bulgaria, Wallachia, and Hungary, to Vienna, and from thence to Paris, then recently entered by the allied powers. It was a period of intense excitement; and, with the exception of an excursion to Basle, where he met his friend and father-in-law, Sir James Mackintosh, he remained in that capital, where he had every opportunity of meeting with the many memorable persons who had crowded to it at that eventful moment, till the return of Bonaparte dispersed and sent them off, each to his own army or country.

Mr. Rich, setting out on his return to Bagdad, passed through Switzerland to Milan, and thence to Venice, where he took a last and unwilling leave of Italy. He crossed over to Trieste, whence he proceeded, by Corfu and the Archipelago, to Constantinople, touching at several of the islands, and landing to examine and explore the site of ancient Troy. From Constantinople he returned to Bagdad, through Asia Minor, taking, as far as possible, a different road from that which he had pursued on his way to Europe, paying marked attention to the geography of the country, and especially the lying of the chains of mountains; and as he came nearer Mesopotamia, visiting the Syrian and Chaldean convents, and collecting information regarding the singular race of Yezzidis.

After his return to the Residency, he resumed his former pursuits; and, during the five or six years that he continued there, added so largely to his collection of MSS. as to render it perhaps the most extensive and valuable ever brought together by any private person in the East. For this the situation of Bagdad gave him peculiar advantages. His collection of coins, Greek, Parthian, Sassanian, and Musulman, was also much enlarged, as was that of his gems and engraved stones, particularly in the article of Babylonian cylinders. It was at this time that he made the second excursion to Babylon, already referred to; and, in 1820, the state of his health requiring change of air, he made a tour into Koor-distan, of which the following pages contain the journal. In his return he visited many of the ancient Christian churches in Chaldea, especially such as he had not had an opportunity of seeing in his former journeys, and besides other curious MSS., was enabled to preserve and to add to his library many valuable and very ancient Syrian and Chaldean versions of the sacred Scriptures.

It was now his intention to have proceeded to Bombay, where he had been appointed to an important office by the Hon. Mountstuart Elphinstone, who was then governor, when a violent and unprovoked attack was made upon the Residency by the orders or with the connivance of the Pasha. This Mr. Rich succeeded in repelling by force of arms, and moved down to Bussora until due reparation was offered. While waiting for instructions from his own government, he employed his time in a tour to Shirauz, whence he visited the ruins of Persepolis, the tomb of Cyrus, and the other remains of antiquity in that neighbourhood. While at Shirauz, the cholera morbus appeared in the city, and with such violence, that it diffused universal dismay, six thousand inhabitants out of a population of forty thousand, being carried off in a few days. The prince, with all his family, all the chief nobles, and the higher classes, and such of the lower as were able, deserted the town. Mr. Rich refused to quit the place, and continued nobly to exert himself to quiet the alarm of the inhabitants, and to assist the sick and dying. His time for many days was chiefly employed in visiting them, and administering the necessary medicines. The tribute of gratitude and respect which he received from the multitudes whom he assisted was most gratifying to his heart. But the disease was already working in his own veins. On leaving the bath on the 4th of October, symptoms of cholera appeared, and, in spite of every assistance and care, he expired on the following morning, the 5th of October. He was interred in the Jehan Numa, one of the royal gardens in which he lived at the time, where a monument has since been erected to his memory.

Such is a very brief notice of the movements rather than of the talents, virtues, and acquirements of this remarkable person. The few but expressive words in which his character has been traced by such men as Robert Hall and Sir James Mackintosh, may well deter any meaner hand from attempting to retrace it. None could know him without being captivated by his manners, and delighted with his accomplishments, nor without admiring the singular extent of his capacity. The rapidity with which he made his acquisitions in languages and the fine arts, in particular, seemed to belong rather to instinct than to exertion. When at a later period of life, he contemplated a survey of Turkish Arabia, with the same facility he acquired the higher mathematical knowledge which his task required. The Turks and Arabs admired him as a man of erudition in their literature. But in the society of his friends, he was only the most agreeable man of the circle ; without pretensions, ready to fall into any plan of amusement, delighted to keep up the ball of wit or good humour, the soul of the party of which he seemed to be the happiest and the youngest. His affections were warm and active. He was the most steady and sincere of friends. He was the fondest of husbands. His sense of religion was deep rooted. His force of character enabled him to sway and guide those among whom he was placed. Never did the British character attain so high a degree of eminence in Turkish Arabia, as when he presided at Bagdad.

The Memoirs on Babylon were the only writings which he published in his lifetime, except a few communications printed in the Mines de l'Orient. He left a considerable number of manuscripts : in particular, an ample journal of his route from Bagdad to Constantinople, in which Mrs. Rich accompanied him on horseback—a solitary instance, it is believed, of such an expedition. His journal from Constantinople to Vienna, and from Paris back to Bagdad, is likewise preserved; besides his journal in Koordistan now printed, and various papers on different subjects.

His magnificent collection of Oriental MSS., of coins and antiquities, was purchased by the British parliament, for the use of the British Museum, in which it is now deposited.

Of the following pages it is not necessary to say much: they speak for themselves. They contain the journal of an eminent man in a new country, for so it may be called in spite of the scattered notices to be found in the journals of travellers who passed casually and hastily through different parts of it. They place the geography of Koordistan, and the manners of the inhabitants, in a new and strong light. The geographical fixed points now ascertained, will assist in rectifying the position not only of the different parts of Koordistan itself, but of the adjoining provinces in that portion of Asia. Mr. Rich certainly intended himself to have published the researches and observations which he made in this his last journey*. He proceeded with all the aids

* Extract of a letter written by James Baillie Fraser, Esq., to William Erskine, Esq., Bombay, dated Shirauz, October 6th, 1821, the day after his death.

“There are among the books he had with him several note and memorandum books, which are, I doubt not, very valuable, containing geographical and astronomical observations, extremely of a scientific survey, and marked carefully in his journal the points which were to direct him. Had he been spared to prepare these papers for the public, he would probably have diffused over them more of the colouring of his imagination, and much of the collateral knowledge that was floating in his mind and ready at his call, and which, on that very account, he did not commit to his journal. At the same time, by the united powers of the pencil and the pen, with the addition of a scientific survey, he has probably done for part of Koordistan, which formerly was only a mass of uncertainty in our best maps, what has hitherto been very imperfectly executed for any other part of Asia. The novelty is honourable to him and to his country.

wanted in our Persian maps. All his notes and observations on Koordistan are either among them, or in those he has at Bushire, and it would be a serious public loss if they were lost. In his writing desk we were careful that not a scrap should escape or be lost, as there seem to be valuable memoranda on all the smaller pieces. I have heard Mr. Rich say that all the maps extant were terribly wrong in that part of Asia, and express his anxiety to get his own map executed, which he meant to do himself. You will also find a most valuable copy of the whole Persepolitan cuneiform inscriptions, written and compared carefully by himself. It was his intention to send a copy of it to Professor Grotefend in Germany."

RESIDENCE IN KOORDISTAN,

&c.

CHAPTER I.

Departure from the Residency—Manner of travelling—Description of our Party—Thunder-storms—Kifri—Sassanian Ruins—Beiat Chief's Hospitality—Naphtha Springs at Toozkhoor-matee.

Bagdad, April 16, 1820.

To escape the intense heat of a Bagdad summer, I have this year determined upon a visit to the mountains of Koordistan, where we are informed we shall meet with a very different climate to that of Bagdad*. As Koordistan is a country little known in Europe, and I have many acquaintances there among the natives, from whom I have often received pressing invitations to visit them, I am glad to have another opportunity of gratifying my insatiable thirst for seeing new countries.

* The heat for about five months at Bagdad I hardly think is paralleled in any part of the world. Some conception of it may be formed, when I mention that from April to October the natives are obliged, during the heat of the day, to take refuge in cellars underground, and at night to sleep on the roofs of their houses, the rooms of the house during that period being uninhabitable. The thermometer generally rises to 115° in a shady verandah; and I have seen it as high as 120° in the middle of the day, and 110° at ten at night, when we suffered much inconvenience from a burning hot wind, smelling strong of sulphur.
—Ed. *

I feel it to be my duty on this occasion to travel in my official character; and, therefore, Mrs. Rich is obliged to submit to the disagreeable restraint of performing the journey in a covered litter or takht-revan*, attended by women-servants, and all the state of a haram†. In order, however, to diminish the inconvenience as much as possible, I propose that a horse shall be in readiness for her to mount, when out of the way of observation. On account of public business, I am likewise compelled to take with me many of the officers and servants of the Residency; and others have requested permission to accompany us: so that we shall form a very numerous party; and, instead of incurring the expense of native troops for our protection on the road, I take the guard of twenty-five sepoy and their soubadar allowed the Resident as a body-guard by the government of Bombay. They are a very respectable, brave set of men, and seem delighted at the prospect of marching.

* Is this the לִיטָר of the Hebrews, rendered litter in our version, Is. lxvi. 20? The Septuagint makes it "a mule litter."—Communicated to the Editor by a friend.

† The haram means the female part of the family of a Turk; and this one word is used to avoid the indecorum, in the eyes of a Mahometan, of mentioning his wives or daughters. It is likewise the name of that part of the house where the females dwell. The Turks are so scrupulous to avoid speaking personally of their female relations, that they will sometimes, when obliged to refer to them, say "My house is sick," or "My house sends compliments to your house."—Ed.

The pasha has been very kind in doing everything in his power to facilitate our journey, and in furnishing us with abundant firmauns, orders, and letters through his territory, and with warm recommendations to the pasha and chiefs of Koordistan.

I appointed the ruined village of Dokhala, about twenty-one miles to the north* of Bagdad, as the place of general rendezvous for the haram, the baggage, the sepoys, and all the rest of the people who did not accompany me.

It was late in the day before I left Bagdad, owing to the many visitors who came to wish me a good journey. This detention was of little consequence, as my first stage was not to be more than five miles distant—to the garden-house of my old and hospitable friend Hagi Abdulla Bey, who has requested me to make his house my first resting-place.

I mounted my horse soon after five in the afternoon, and reached the garden between six and seven, where I was received most cordially by the bey, and found a very splendid Turkish entertainment prepared for me. Mrs. Rich* was equally well received by her friend Salkha Khatoon, one of the widows of old Suleiman Pasha, who was the governor of Bagdad upwards of twenty years, and died in the year 1804. He was a Georgian slave of his predecessor, but was a man of considerable ability; and, by his energy, promptitude and wisdom, subjected the various tribes within, and kept in awe those without, his dominions. Agriculture and commerce were thus promoted; and Bagdad became very flourishing under his paternal and judicious government. He left three sons, who were much beloved by the people of the town for his sake; and much respected, therefore, by his successors in the Pashalik. The two remaining ones live with their respective mothers, affluent, and as much at ease as affluent people of consequence can be in a place where they are watched with a very jealous eye by the government; especially since another son, the eldest, had made himself very formidable, and finally succeeded, through much treachery and falsehood, in becoming pasha. He enjoyed his dignity but a very few years, and was overpowered by his own brother-in-law Daoud, who put him to death, and afterwards received from the Porte the firmaun confirming him in the government.

* See, in the Appendix, "Fragment of a Journal by Mrs. Rich."

April 17.—I took leave of Hagi Abdulla Bey, and left his garden-house at a quarter past seven in the morning. The road was through a very uninteresting country; and at a quarter to one I arrived at our camp, which I found already pitched at Dokhala. Mrs. Rich arrived about an hour afterwards; and in the afternoon I went round the camp, to see that all our party were assembled, and were comfortable. To have accommodated such a number of people in the villages on the road would have been out of the question. I had, therefore, been obliged to take tents; and we were accompanied by a body of Arab tent-pitchers, to pitch and raise the camp every night and morning. It consisted of fourteen or fifteen tents: as small a number as we could possibly do with, for a party of between fifty and sixty people*. There was a good deal of noise and confusion through the day, until every one had fallen into his place, and things were put in order. At night there was a storm of rain, to which the poor muleteers, tent-pitchers, and animals were exposed, no tents ever being thought necessary for them.

* The commander of this party, composed of Christians, Jews, Turks, Armenians, Persians, and Indians, was Aga Minas, the principal native officer of the Residency. He was of a respectable Armenian family, long in the service of the British government. The situation which he held, and his own abilities, constituted him director of Mr. Rich's household at Bagdad; and on this journey he continued to act in the same character. He was purse-bearer and aide-de-camp; entertained all our numerous guests on the road, directed the camp, and was, in short, the person to whom everybody looked for orders and for help, and with whom often no one was satisfied, only because he could not accomplish impossibilities. He had all the patience and good humour which such a post required—was unwearied in his endeavours to make every one comfortable, and most zealous in the discharge of his duty.—Ed.

April 18.—Mr. Bellino* and I, accompanied by some of the light horsemen of our suite, mounted at a quarter past six, before the rest of the camp was ready to start ; but I was glad to escape the confusion and noise of the many voices in many tongues, which, together with the snorting and neighing of horses, jingling of the bells of the mules, and barking of the dogs, are the usual accompaniments of an eastern camp.

Mrs. Rich, in her takht-revan, followed us at some distance, accompanied by her female attendants in kajavahs, or a kind of cradle, swung one on each side of a mule—and by some horsemen as an escort.

Turkish etiquette required our parties to be quite separate ; and we allowed our people to have their own way, and to marshal us according to their own notions of dignity and decorum. I have always made a rule of conforming to the native customs, so far as my conscience and the honour of

* Mr. Bellino was a German gentleman, a native of Tubingen in Suabia, with whom Mr. Rich had become acquainted in Vienna, where he was at college. His love of oriental literature, and desire to visit the East, induced him to propose to Mr. Rich, through M. Von Hammer, the historian of Turkey, a common friend, to accompany him back to Bagdad ; and Mr. Rich was glad to have it in his power to offer him a situation as private secretary. He was a most amiable, well-educated young man, with much of the enthusiasm, perseverance, and naïveté of his countrymen, and no small share of learning. His favourite study, grammar and language, he pursued with an ardour and devotedness truly Germanic.

my country would admit. The Turks are a very ceremonious people, and a people who think state and show indispensable ; and any one by whom these are despised is looked upon by them as vulgar and ignorant, and unaccustomed to good society. But, above all, they have a horror of women being seen or heard ; and I am inclined to believe, that a Turk who overcomes his dislike to this has lost some of his best feelings : at least, with all such whom I have seen this has been the case ; and I am very sure, that the respect and kindness with which we have generally been received among the Mahometans has been greatly owing to our not offending them in these things, and not shocking their feelings, by despising harmless prejudices, from which, at any rate, we could not expect to turn them.

We had great trouble from the mud through this day's march. Between eight and nine we alighted to take a cup of coffee, at a place called Mukhsen Pauk, a little imaum on a canal from the Khalis*. We reached our halting-place, the bed of an old canal, at a quarter to twelve.

April 19.—The weather yesterday afternoon became very stormy from the E. and N.E. ; and at half-past seven there was a squall of rain, with thunder and lightning. The night then partially cleared up ; but at midnight it came on again to blow hard, with heavy rain, thunder, and lightning, which lasted till morning. The tents, by this time, became so heavy, that the striking and loading them was almost impossible; and the country, besides, was quite covered with water, so that there was no thinking of marching to-day. The ground, where we encamped on the old canal, is full of scorpions; our farrier, in levelling what he thought a snug nook for his bed, in the bank of the canal, turned up four: many others were found about the tents. This is commonly the case in all heaps, or mounts, in this country. There is a mount near Shehraban which is quite alive with them. At 4 P.M. a heavy squall from the west came against the prevailing wind, which was S.E.

* The Khalis is a canal which is cut from the Diala to the Tigris.

Thermometer—at 7 A.M. 66° ; at 3 P.M. 76° ; at 10 P.M. 66° .

April 20.—Heavy rain continued pouring down upon us last night, to the great annoyance of our poor people; and to march to-day is out of the question. At noon we had a storm of thunder and rain, which passed quickly over; but from one to three there was a continued roll of thunder from the north-west. Most of the storms, however, passed to the north of our camp; and afterwards the sky became quite clear, with a gentle air from N.N.E. I never remember so curious a season; and its effects are most unpleasant to us travellers.

Thermometer during the storm, 66° .

April 21.—During the night there was lightning all round the horizon, with distant thunder, which kept us in a state of great anxiety. In the morning, wind east and south-east.

We marched at half-past six in a smart shower of rain from the S.E. The cloud from which it fell accompanied us for some time, occasionally favouring us with a discharge. We had ten or fifteen peasants with us to act as pioneers, in repairing bridges and smoothing bad passages for the takht-revan. We had a difficult march, wading through water and mire most of the way ; and at 10 A.M. arrived at Telhubook, where we encamped on our old ground*, which happened to be quite dry. The takht-revan marched half an hour before, and arrived ten minutes after us. One of the disadvantages of travelling with a large party is, that the peasants conceal every supply of a tolerable quality which they may happen to have, from fear of having it taken from them by force, especially if they perceive any government officers among the party.

In the evening, the sky again became overcast. The lightning first appeared after sunset in the N. and N.W.; and a gentle breeze soon set in from that quarter, but was forced to yield to the more powerful S.E. The horizon grew black as a raven's wing all round, and the lightning was repeated from every quarter in the most rapid succession of flashes I think I ever remember; but the thunder was very distant. In the west the colour of the horizon was that perfect black, that total absence of light, which Lord Byron has fancied in his horrible dream of the extinction of the sun. We were only conscious of this fearful darkness in the short intervals of the lightning, which was peculiarly vivid in that quarter; streams of fire seemed every now and then to be darted into the earth. The glare of the lightning showed at each flash an Indian sentinel resting on his musket, a tent with a group of muleteers, or a small party of travellers winding their weary way through the solitude of the desert. To a poet the scene would have been invaluable; but it only kept us in painful suspense as to what storm or torrent we were about to be exposed, which our light and half-worn tents could but ill stand. At last, after having been driven about by the contending upper currents in every direction, the tempest seemed to burst to the S.W. of us; and we only received a part of the discharge in a very heavy shower of rain, which lasted about three hours (from nine to twelve), and was succeeded by some strong blasts of wind from the S.E. The fleas, the mosquitoes, and a return of my Bagdad complaint, kept me awake till near morning, when I fell asleep.

* This refers to a journey which Mr. Rich had lately made into S. Koordistan, to examine the ruins of Kasri Shireen and Haoush Kerek. This journal will be found in the Appendix.

April 22.—When I awoke the next morning, at half-past five, I found the whole sky wearing the dull, leaden appearance of a determined rainy day: I therefore gave up all thoughts of marching that day. About half-past six it began, and continued in a steady, wintry manner through the day, to our utter despair. About sunset it cleared up with a squall of wind from the south-east.

Thermometer—at 7 A.M. 63° ; at 3 P.M. 67° ; at 10 P.M. 62° .

April 23.—A fine clear night, with a gentle breeze from the S.E. In the morning the N.W. wind again strove to make its way, but was again obliged to yield to the stronger south-east.

We mounted at a quarter past six. Near Tehubook we observed mounds of ruins; but we were not disposed to stop and examine them. We were obliged to turn out of our road and keep towards the Diala, on account of the waters left by yesterday's rain. The line of Mount Zagros, extending to the Tauk, formed the extreme boundary of our view as soon as we left the village of Tehubook, which is situated rather in a hollow.

At nine, we arrived at Delli Abbas. The post-house is now entirely ruined and abandoned; but we encamped between it and the Khalis canal, over which is a bridge of two arches, with a supplemental one on each side for extraordinary risings. The general direction of our march was N. The takht-revan and baggage marched at half-past six, and arrived at ten. The villagers tell us that they have had eight days' constant rain here, which has laid the country quite under water. On the night of Tuesday three fire-balls, or meteors, were seen here to come from the west, and take a course towards the Hamreen hills with great rapidity. Indeed the quantity of electric matter has been prodigious. I never saw such constant and vivid lightning as has been every day since the bad weather began. Soon after we came to our ground it blew very hard from the south; near sunset it came west of south. Much lightning all night from N.W. to S.W., but no thunder; the night calm and slightly veiled.

Thermometer—at 6 A.M. 60°; at 3 P.M. 74°; at 10 P.M. 64°.

April 24.—We could not go the direct passage over the Hamreen hills; all the road between them and Delli Abbas being almost entirely under water; and on the left a morass, called Albu Ferash, quite full of water, extending down to Doltova. We therefore went to our old pass by which we had come on our former trip. We mounted at half-past five, and waded through much water and mire to the pass, which we reached at half-past six. The cut mentioned before was made by the grandfather of Fyzullah Aga (a friend of mine at Bagdad) in the time of Omar Pasha. It is called Sakal Toutan, or Beard-catcher. At half-past seven we passed the road to Baradan, branching off on the right, to which village we had intended going, but the Nareen was reported to be too difficult to ford, in consequence of the late rains. At a quarter past eight we had passed over the mountains, and keeping them close on our left hand, reached the bridge of the Nareen at twenty minutes past ten. The rise of water in this stream had been about ten feet; but it had almost entirely gone down again. Here we drank coffee, and mounted again at eleven. We now kept nearer the Nareen than the direct road, in order to avoid the deep mud of the nitrous ground, which we left on our right.

At twenty minutes before one we arrived at Karatépéh. The takht-revan marched at six, and arrived at half-past two. They were detained thus long on the road by going the straight but miry road from the Nareen, instead of taking a circuit to avoid it, as we had done.

At the south end of the village and adjoining to it, near our camp, is a high mound, on which is a small burial-ground. The people call it Namazkelan Tepéh, or the Mount of Prayer, because it is the Musella, or place where they perform their prayers on the two feasts of Bairam. I went up to the mount to take some sights with the compass; and I immediately observed that it was artificial. This set Aga Seyd* looking about, and he soon discovered an urn with bones, like those found at Seleucia and Babylon. On looking further, we discovered more; but they were so brittle that they could only be extracted by pieces. They were on the surface of the soil; and the whole mount seemed to be full of them. This then, I think, must have been a Dakhma, or place where the fire-worshipping Persians exposed their dead bodies; which has since served for a sepulchre, and place of prayer, of the Mahometans. The people told me that they sometimes find small silver ornaments here; but they happened to have no specimens by them. This mount at the southern extremity, and where it is highest, is from fifteen to twenty feet high from the bottom.

* Mr. Rich's Persian secretary.

Thermometer—at 6 A.M. 60°; at 3 P.M. 74°; at 10 P.M. 64°.

April 25.—We marched at half-past five over the gravelly hills, on the western declivity of which Kara-tepéh is situated. The slope was extremely gentle into a small valley and over an arm of the hills; from which the descent is by a long slope to the Tehemen bridge, which we reached at a quarter past seven. After crossing a broad torrent at ten minutes past nine A.M. we alighted to take coffee, just after ascending another elevation also by a very gradual slope. At twenty minutes to ten A.M. we mounted again, and at eleven arrived at Kifri.

The Zabit* had gone out to meet me, with fifteen horsemen to the torrent; but we missed each other in the hills. The takht-revan marched at six, and arrived at twelve. It had a difficult passage at the Kior-dereh, or ravine. I was surprised to find at Kifri a small community of Jews who have a synagogue. The people here eat the bulbous roots of a plant gathered in abundance all about. The bulbs are of the size of a shallot: they are called chezedum, and are eaten slightly roasted, tasting something like a chestnut.

Thermometer—at 3 P.M. 82°; at 10 P.M. 64°.

April 26.—Yesterday evening, in my walk to the cliff at the back of Kifri, I heard accidentally of some ruins called Kara Oghlan, which I immediately went to see. This morning we returned to them with a party of peasants armed with pickaxes and shovels, and remained about four hours excavating and looking about us. The following is a short description of them.

About half a mile S.E. of Kifri, in the bed of the torrent, are some appearances of low walls or foundations, which were laid open by the late rains. One of the walls exhibited a piece of plaster of stucco, with ornaments on it. I was anxious to lay open more of the ruins, in order to come at some notion of the design and age of it. By dint of digging we laid open a small room, or rather all that remains standing of it, viz., about four feet high of wall with a door-way; the room is very small, say about twelve feet square; the walls are built of unshapen stones (as at Kasri Shireen), of gypsum covered with plaster, on which are wrought ornaments in compartments. We dug out pieces of plaster with ornaments of flowers or arabesques painted on them in fresco, the outline being black and filled up with bright red, and the ground being the colour of the plaster; the colours were beautifully fresh. As the sides bore no appearance of painting, I imagine these pieces to be fragments of the ceiling. Some pieces of charcoal were also found. We laid open this room and part of another. This appeared to form part of a range of cells, extending a short way W.S.W. and E.N.E., of which there seem to be traces of five or six: they are in single file. The north side is strengthened with small round buttresses.

* Head of the village.

East of this, under the hills on the margin of the torrent, (by which its west face has indeed been cut down,) is a very large high mound, of a square figure, from which a quantity of earthen jars have been dug out, some pieces of which were brought to me. They were of coarse earthenware, varnished black in the inside, and perfectly resembled those found at Seleucia and Babylon. I have also a small earthen lamp which was found there. It is like the lamp now used by the villagers.

Gold and silver coins are also frequently found here, which the villagers immediately melt down. I much regret not having been able to see any one of these, which might have enabled me to form some better general idea of the age of these ruins. The jars, or sepulchral urns, however, induce me to refer them to the Sassanians. On the top of this mound are traces of building; and all along to the foot of the hills, and up as far as opposite Kifri, are also vestiges of buildings, many of which consist of square basements, something like those at Kasr Shireen and Haoush Kerek, though not standing so high above the soil. The extent of the ruins in length may be a mile; in breadth about a quarter of a mile. We dug in several places, but found nothing. There are also some vestiges of a wall on the western bank of the torrent; and, crossing it diagonally about Kifri, are fragments of immense solid buildings, overthrown by the floods, which the peasants suppose to have been a dam across the torrent, but which I rather imagine to be the city wall. The style is just like the other parts of the ruins, of rough stones, strongly cemented together with lime. It is evident, from the remains in the very centre of the torrent, that it could not have flowed in this way when the city existed. Indeed, in all likelihood it was confined, and directed to cultivation.

The inhabitants attribute these works to the Ghiaours, or infidels. What place this really was it would be difficult, from our imperfect knowledge of the Sassanian empire, to say. I doubt its being in any line of the Roman operations against that empire, by which alone we know anything about it.

Farther up the torrent, on the N.N.W., are some excavations in the rock, called Ghiaour houses. Mr. Bellino went to see some of the same kind in the hills, ten minutes' ride from the S. extremity of the ruins. He found excavated sepulchral chambers, with very low doors, and, in the inside, three places to lay out bodies, but they were of small dimensions, about five feet long. The plan of these excavations resembled the Achæmenian sepulchres at Nakshi Rustam; but there was no writing or carving of any description about them. Farther on, about three miles from the ruins, on the top of a hill, are some vestiges of building, which the people call Kiz Kalasi, or the Girl's Castle. Here urns and bones are found; Mr. Bellino saw one of the former; but the place has nothing else remarkable: it is nearly opposite Oniki Imaum.

We found waiting for us, when we returned, a man from Mahmoud Pasha*; and, indeed, yesterday evening another courier came in from him, to know if we were arrived, and what road we proposed taking. They both set off this morning for Sulimania, from whence a mehmandar is to be despatched to meet us at Kara Hassan, that being the road we have finally resolved on taking, on account of its ease for the takht-revan.

* The Pasha of Sulimania.

There are only a few date-trees at Kifri: the date is said not to succeed here, but does very well at Toozkhoormattee. Since we were here last the water has brought down several large masses of the cliff.

Thermometer—at 3 P.M. 82°. Wind N.W.

April 27.—This morning we rode out to inspect the ruins of Eski Kifri, situated S.W. of Kifri, two hours in the plain. I had always imagined that this was, in reality, where the town of Kifri had formerly stood; but I find now that it always occupied its present position, and that these ruins are of the time of the Ghiaours. In our way to it we passed several mills, looking like little towers, in the gardens of Kifri, turned by a small artificial canal. Approaching Eski Kifri is an immense artificial mount, like the Mujelibe*, with almost perpendicular sides, except where the rains have made deep cuts or furrows. In one of these furrows a small vault has been lately discovered; it is of coarse-baked brick, and contained many sepulchral urns, in some of which gold coins were found, but of these I could not procure any; and the vault has been almost filled up again by the falling in of the soil, or rubbish, of which the mount is composed. The length of the mount from N. to S. is nine hundred and sixty feet; its breadth from E. to W. a little less; its height fifty-seven feet. These measurements, which, though rough ones, may be considered as sufficient approximations, were taken by the carpenter, assisted by Aga Seyd, while I went to rest myself in the shade in a cut made by the rain; for the wind was S.E., the day hot, and I had a strong return of my complaint. This cut, or ravine, was, in fact, the best place to look about for antiques, as it was quite fresh, having been made by the late rains. We dug about it, and found immense quantities of small pieces of human bones, and fragments of urns, all of which had a black varnish on the inside; but the pottery was of different quality, some coarse and unornamented; others of a finer kind; and the finest, with figures of deer or cows in small circular compartments. Of these we brought away all we could find; and we did our utmost to procure a perfect urn, but in vain; though such are frequently found, especially after heavy rains have uncovered the soil. I set the people digging about in every direction; but they found nothing to reward their toil except some scorice of iron, a few bits of copper, some glass, and a small crystal bead. I have taken measures, however, to procure a perfect urn. The soil, as deep as we could discover by means of this ravine, was impregnated with black unctuous mould, fragments of urns, and small bits of bones. On the centre of the mound is a small burial-place of Arabs; and the Mussulman now confounds his dust with that of the fire-worshipping Persian; for that this was a Sassanian place of exposing the dead I have no doubt, from its appearance and character, and the style of the fragments found.

* One of the ruins at Babylon. See "Memoir on the Ruins of Babylon," by C. J. Rich, Esq., p. 28.

To the north and west is a great extent of small mounds of ruins, which shows this to have been a considerable place. One mound, larger than the rest, on the west, is called Ashtoukan. Returning homewards, we came, in about a quarter of an hour's ride, to some remains of a small wall, which may have been the city wall, though the peasants conjecture it to have been a dam, to keep out inundations from the Kifri torrent. It is reduced to a few feet in height, and extends about three hundred yards, and is built of round stones, with small hollows in the outside. On the inside, towards the ruins, the ground is higher than on the north or outside, and is like a platform supported by this wall. The wall itself is unquestionably of the age of the remains of Kasri Shireen and Haoush Kerek. Farther north, towards Kifri, beyond the wall, are no ruins. We left Eski Kifri at a quarter past ten, and arrived at Kifri at ten minutes to twelve A.M.

I had given orders to bring me any coins or other antiques that might be procurable among the peasants here. To-day Reuben brought me, from his Israelitish friends, three coins and a small intaglio: but so far from throwing light upon the age of the neighbouring ruins, they are as if purposely designed to obscure and to confuse one: one being Arsacian; another, Sassanian; the third, Coufic; and the intaglio, a Roman victory. I afterwards got a very fine Sassanian antique, with an inscription. At a place called Oniki Imam, about fourteen miles from Kifri, is another of the mounts so common hereabouts: it seems to be of the same age as the Sassanian ruins, so thickly scattered there; and just opposite Oniki Imam in the gypsous chain of hills there are naphtha springs. One small spring was discovered a year ago in the same hills, a few minutes west of Kifri. The peasant who discovered it was seized by the Turkish government, and severely bastinadoed, to make him confess if he had sold any of the naphtha before the discovery became public. In consequence of the persecution which he suffered on account of this unlucky discovery, he was obliged to emigrate with his family into Persia, where he says he is very comfortable. He happened to be here on business, and told me the story himself. "God," said he, "did not allow the Turks to profit by their tyranny; for the spring, which was a very copious one when I discovered it, became dry when I was bastinadoed, and now only yields a few drops of no consequence."

Thermometer—at 3 P.M. 81° ; at 10 P.M. 66° . Light, variable airs; a little rain from the west at night; lightning in the east.

April 28.—We mounted at twenty minutes before six in the morning, attended by the zabit, who insisted on bearing me company some part of the way. Our road lay across a range of gravelly hills, proceeding from the Kifri hills, and joining those over which we passed some days ago; the only interruption being the course of the Kifri torrent, which has opened for itself a passage into the valley of the Tchemen, through which passage we rode to Eski Kifri*. At seven we left the hills, and entered the Beiat plain, which slopes down very gradually from the Kifri hills to the Tchemen, and is well cultivated for these parts.

At half past seven we passed a ravine, with a small stream of rain-water in it. At twenty minutes after eight we came to Kuru Tchai, a broad torrent with now only a little rain-water in it, but which a few days ago occupied its whole bed, and even overflowed into the plain, as we saw by the traces which it had left. Here was an encampment of the Beiat Turcomans.

* In like manner, subordinate gravelly hills branch out from the Hamreen, above Kara-tepéh and from the Zengabad range of hills.

Hassan, or as he is sometimes called, Kerkoosh Bey, the chief of the tribe, came out to invite me to eat with him. He was a very well-looking, fresh man, with a fine white beard, and extremely intelligent and well spoken, with as good manners as if he had passed all his life in an oriental court. He told me that the Beiats possessed the district as a gift from the sultan; and that they paid nothing to the Ottoman government, but only owed the Pasha of Bagdad, for the time being, military service when he took the field in person. He said that when Nadir Shah invaded this country he swept the Beiats back to the great tribe in Khorasan, and that the Beiats now remaining are almost all, as it were, of the family of the chief; but he added that, in case of necessity, they could still turn out 1000 horsemen. They have also some Arabs and broken tribes under their protection. Their horses are much esteemed.

The bey was fully aware of the existence of the great Beiat tribe in Khorasan; but he was not able to inform me when their portion of it came into these countries first. The Arabs are better historians and genealogists; the best, indeed, in the East.

I took leave of the bey much pleased with his address and conversation, and at nine mounted again. We passed through much cultivation, principally of barley; some portion of which was already ripe, and they were cutting it. The reapers brought us some sheaves, which they threw into the road before my horse, exclaiming, "May your enemies be thus!" and they expected a few paras in return. In the East, everything is seized upon as an occasion for extracting a bakshish or present.

At half past nine we came to Kizzel Kharaba, a ruin on the road. Mounds were visible, scattered about and extending down towards the Hamreen on our left, where we saw a very large mount, like the one at Eski Kifri. They said that it was the work of the Ghiaours. It is most likely Sassanian, though I would not take upon me to affirm this as confidently as in the case of Eski Kifri.

We soon after passed another ruin, seemingly connected with the town of which Kizzel Kharaba formed a part: and at a quarter to eleven, a large Beiat village, now quite empty; as the people encamp at this season, both to avoid fleas and to superintend the harvest. We saw many of these encampments all about.

At ten minutes past eleven A.M. we passed another large village. We now lost sight of the Hamreen mountains, which were on our left all day, by their running off more west, and Toozkhoormattee came in sight, bearing N. 20 W. About a quarter of an hour before coming to it, we passed a torrent, the bed of which is extremely broad; but now contains a stream that only reached to the stirrups, and was a few yards over, and it is even less than this in the autumn, having been lately much swollen by the extraordinary rains. It is called the Ak-soo, and comes down from Ibrahim Khanjee.

On our left, at a distance of a couple of hours, we saw the village of Yenijeh, which is on the present post-road from Bagdad to Taook.

At half past twelve, having crossed the torrent, I pitched my shemsia*; and sent a tchaoush into the town to get the serai† ready, and give notice of my approach. I was soon joined by the governor and steward of Omar Bey, who holds the town as a timar, having inherited it from his father. We rode through gardens of date, orange, lemon, fig, apricot, pomegranate, and olive trees, which completely conceal the town; and were soon comfortably lodged in the house of Omar Bey, which, for a Bagdad country residence, is really splendid. The rest of the place is merely built of mud. The people are Turkish, and are mostly Ismaelians, or Tcheragh Sonderans‡.

* Or protector from the sun; a small light tent, which is quickly put up and taken down. Turkish gentlemen are generally accompanied by one, on their hunting-parties and journeys, as they are frequently far away from all houses; and, therefore, when they desire to halt—as they generally do in the middle of the day, to refresh themselves with coffee—they pitch the shemsia.—Ed.

† Or palace. Toozkhoormattee was the property of Omar Bey, a gentleman of Bagdad, who had desired his own house to be prepared for the reception of Mr. Rich and his family.

‡ Or “extinguishers of the light.” These people are dispersed

On Friday night they had a tremendous storm of hail here, which did great damage to the gardens. The hailstones are described as having been of enormous size. This was the night which appeared so threatening to us at Tehubook.

Toozkhoormattee is situated close to the gypsous hills of Kifri, and just west of the pass in them by which the Ak-soo penetrates into the plain. On this pass is a well of naphtha and salt; and farther south in the hills, is another spring of naphtha, but no salt.

The takht-revan arrived in about half an hour after us, having marched at six o'clock. Our march to-day was much longer than it need have been, had we kept the straight road under the hills; but it was the intention of the Oda Bashi* to bring us to the halt among the Beiats, and so make two easy stages of it: however, when I came to the Beiats, it occurred to me that we had better hasten on, and take advantage of the very fine day.

April 29.—I sallied forth this morning to view the curiosities of the neighbourhood. The naphtha-pit is in the pass of the hills about a mile S.E. of throughout the Turkish and, I believe, Persian dominions. Little or nothing is known of their religious profession, except that they are not Mahometans, from whom they get a variety of names in different places. They are very shy and uncommunicative, for fear, probably, of awakening a spirit of active persecution in their masters.—Ed.

* The director of the camp.

the town ; and, being in the bed of the torrent, is sometimes overflowed by it, and, for a time, spoilt, which was the case during the heats last summer. The pit is about fifteen feet deep, and, to the height of ten feet, filled with water ; on the surface of which the black oil of naphtha floats, small air-bubbles continually rising to the surface. They skim off the naphtha, and ladle out the water into a channel, which distributes it into a set of oblong, shallow compartments made in the gravel, where they allow it to crystallize, when it becomes very good salt, of a fine, white, brilliant grain, without any intermixture of bitterness. Great quantities of this are exported into Koordistan ; and it is worth annually about 20,000 piastres, which is distributed among the different members of the family of the late Defterdar*. The oil of naphtha is the property of the village. Part of it is consumed by the Menzil Khaneh †, or sold for its support, and part for religious establishments, &c. About two jars, each containing six okas‡, or one Bagdad batman, of naphtha may be skimmed from this well in twenty-four hours. The spring is at the bottom of the pit or well ; and once a year they cleanse the well, on which occasion the whole village turns out ; victuals are distributed to all the poor, and sacrifices of sheep are made, to the sound of drums and oboes, in order to insure the good flowing of the spring again—a ceremony, in all probability, derived from remote antiquity. The principal naphtha-springs are in the hills, a considerable distance south of this, towards Kifri. They are five or six in number, and are much more productive than this pit, but no salt is found there. Indeed, it is probable that naphtha may be found in almost any part of this chain. Near the naphtha-pit in the hills are alum (zak or sheb) and chalk (tebeshin), of a very fine, close, white grain; but the natives make no use of these productions. An earth is found, which they employ to give an acid flavour to some of their dishes; no doubt it is vitriolic. Sulphur is also found, and is used by the peasants to cure the itch in their cattle and themselves.

* The treasurer of the Porte, father of Omar Bey. † Post-house.

‡ An oka contains about two and a half English pints.

I now come to a description of the pass itself. It runs nearly E. and W., and resembles that of Kifri in its composition and appearance, though on a larger scale. On the west side of the hill, which faces the plain, the strata are horizontal and parallel. On the north side of the pass they are inclined downwards at an angle of about 45° , and somewhat curved or convex. On the south side of the pass the hills are more earthy, and have been furrowed and crumbled down by the rains; and in one part some pillars, as it were, of the hill are left detached. The naphtha pit may, indeed, be said to be situated in these débris on the edge of the torrent's bed ; gypsum is apparent in every part. On the north side is sandstone ; and at the bottom of all, as I saw in an arch or cavern in the very foot of the cliff, is clay-slate, or hardened clay of a blue colour. The determination of the water is all to the north side of the pass, where it has cut down the hills into a precipice or cliff. On the summit of this cliff are the ruined walls of an old castle, the age of which it is difficult to determine: it may be Sassanian. At the foot of this is a little hollow in the rock, containing a naphtha-pit. The top has been arched over with large square blocks of gypsum, and is apparently a very ancient work.

I had forgotten to say, that in the great naphtha-pit is a beam of wood, just above the surface of the water, fixed at both ends into the side of the pit. This wood, they say, is as old as the time of the Ghiaours, and has been preserved by the virtue of the naphtha oil. They also attribute the castle to the Ghiaours*. In the earth about the foot of the castle-hill, near the small naphtha-pit, I saw many stains of a bright yellow, and perceived a strong smell of sulphur. The people consider this cliff as a great preserver of Toozkhoormattee ; they say it turns off the torrent and gives it an inclination from the town. On the summit of the hills, on the north side of the pass, overlooking the plain, is a small kumbet or dome, marking the site of some foolish story about Ali. They say, on the eve of Friday, a little lamp is seen to burn of itself there : it is most probably a similar phenomenon to Baba Goorgoor*.

* Ghiaour, originally Geber or fire-worshipper, is now synonymous with Kafer, and is applied to the people who preceded the Mahometans, as well as to Europeans.

After having finished our observations on the naphtha-pits, we rode round the town by the torrent to the west, to see some ruins, but we found little worthy of observation. A party of peasants were employed in cleansing a canal, to the sound of the zoorna, or trumpet, and double drum. The reapers were at work in some places. On the west of the town are some mounds of rubbish, with nothing to characterize them. They may possibly be ancient, as antiques are said to be found here ; but I have not yet been able to procure any. On a little square platform of a building is one pier of it standing, of coarse masonry, apparently not very ancient. Farther north, are six piers standing, forming part of an oblong building, whose direction is east and west, and it appears to have been composed of a body and two aisles, or verandahs. The door is west, and another corresponding recess or opening on the east has been supported on each side by a semicircular pilaster or buttress. The whole has been vaulted; the masonry is extremely rude. I should conjecture this to have been a church; it greatly resembles the ruins of Chaldean and Syrian churches I have seen. The mounds are scattered about to a great extent, and prove this to have been, at some former period, a considerable place. From the principal mound the Hamreen mountains were in sight, in the western horizon; the distance is said to be about nine hours. We could also see plainly where the Karatépéh or Zengabad range strikes off from the Hamreen, and pursues a more easterly direction.

* Baba Goorgoor is the name given to a spot three miles from Kerkook, where, in a little circular plain, white with naphtha, flames of fire issue from many places. There appears to be little doubt, as D'Anville conjectures, that this is the Korkura of Ptolemy.—See “D'Anville on the Euphrates and Tigris.” Quarto edition, p. 108.

The ruined castle or wall on the hill in the pass is said to have extended across it, the river being confined within a proper channel and crossed by a bridge. This appears probable; for the wall and cliff are both broken down together abruptly, as if they had been continued farther on the torrent side. A man, who died lately at the age of 120, is reported to have said that he remembered the cliff and wall extending much farther over the torrent than it does now; and that the torrent was confined within a narrower channel. He had also heard the above story from other old men. This was most likely a derbent, or barrier, to secure the country from the incursions of the Koords, who, in all ages must have been troublesome neighbours. This is one of the passes into Koordistan, through which there is a road leading to Ibrahim Khanjee ; but it is a difficult one, as it passes the whole way over small ridges of hills.

From Toozkhoormattee to Ibrahim Khanjee is nine hours : from Kifri to Ibrahim Khanjee, also nine hours ; but the road is level and good.

Shortly after our arrival came in Mohammed Aga, Mahmood Pasha's Ishik Agassi, or master of the ceremonies. He was appointed our Mehmandar ; and brought me very handsome letters from Mahmood Pasha.

At Toozkhoormattee is a post-house containing eighty horses.

Thermometer—at 6 A.M. 64° ; at noon, 70° ; at 3 P.M. 66° ; wind S.E., blowing hard, with rain, in the afternoon.

April 30.—I felt much indisposed to-day, so that I did not stir out ; but I collected the following particulars :—The Ak-soo or Khoormattee river rises in Koordistan, at Ali Delloo, in the Karadagh ; and, passing by Ibrahim Khanjee, comes to Toozkhoormattee. The mills in this country have each a little mud tower attached to it, in which to post a guard against thieves ; all the places on the Koordish border being very subject to inroads from robbers of that nation. The population of Toozkhoormattee is estimated at about 5000 souls.

Thermometer—at 7 A.M. 62°; at 3 P.M. 71°; at 10 66°. Wind N. in the morning; at 2 P.M. a slight squall with a little rain from the W. Very vivid lightning at night, which began in the W., and passed over to the S. We have not had a day without lightning since we left Bagdad.

CHAPTER II.

Departure from Toozkhoormattee—The Valley of Leilan—Yusuff Aga's camp—His hospitality—Entrance into Koordistan—Cultivation and appearance of the country—Present of provisions from the Pasha of Sulimania—Arrival at our camp before Sulimania—Visit of the Pashas—Of Koordish gentlemen.

May 1.—WE left Toozkhoormattee at half-past five; the road N. 75 W. We had the gypsous hills close on our right; on our left a plain inclining down, by a very gentle slope, to the Hamreen mountains, which were distinctly visible. They appear to make a bend here, or to advance from the W.; the nearest point to us being indented like an embattled wall, and bearing N. 85 W.

The Adhaym* passes the mountains half an hour below this point, and below that again is Demir Kapi; a pass which has been fortified, and where there is an iron gate.

Above the notched or indented point in the hills, the chain appears again to bend westerly. At 7 A.M., road N. 45 W., and here the gypsum range looked as if it terminated; but I believe it does not really: it rather becomes a low range of gravelly hills, the sandstone here and there showing itself, and inclining towards the west. Our road skirted along and kept these gravelly hills on our right hand. At twenty minutes before eight the minarets of Taook became visible. I went to a little hill (part of the gravelly branch) just on the right of the road, and from it had the good fortune to see both Taook and Toozkhoormattee at once, at the extreme north and south points of the horizon. Taook N. 15 W., Toozkhoormattee S. 15 E. Hence, also, I saw that the gypsous range appeared suddenly broken down at its north extremity, the western edge of which sends out the gravelly line, along which we have been travelling for an hour. It sweeps off to the east; and the intermediate space is a basin filled with debris, or gravelly hills, channelled and divided into hillocks by torrents or rain-streams finding their way into torrents. A few yards on is a kahreez, the first we had met on this road. It is a subterraneous channel, for conducting a spring from the hills to the cultivation in the plain; with shafts or wells sunk at intervals, which mark its line. Ten minutes farther on is another broad torrent, only filled in sudden heavy rains. This is reckoned half way between Taook and Toozkhoormattee; and still farther is another smaller torrent, with a small stream of very limpid water in it. Our road now became indented, or undulating, in a very slight degree, and at ten we reached the formidable Taook Tchai, which rises in Koordistan, a little on the right of our proposed road, and passing by Kara Hassan, is there turned off into many streams, as occasion requires, which irrigate the cultivation of several villages. In summer it is mostly consumed by the cultivation; then, and in autumn, its water is here only about a foot or a foot and a half deep. It also waters many villages westward and northward of this; but at periods of heavy rain, in the winter and spring, it is a most formidable stream, filling its whole bed, which is nearly half a mile broad, rushing down with great fury, bringing with it large stones, and forming hollows, which render the passage always dangerous, and often wholly impracticable. The rise is sometimes so sudden, that it has been known to surprise people when half way over, and they have often been lost, or with difficulty extricated. There was a very great rise lately, after the heavy rains, and many bodies of men and animals were seen floating by. This was also the case during the extraordinary rains last summer. At present we found it very passable; and the zabit met us with about fifty men (accompanied by the double drums and zoornas, or trumpets) to help us and our baggage over.

* The Adhaym is the trunk stream which receives the Kerkook, Taook, and Toozkhoormattee waters.

We found two streams of water in the bed; the first was about two feet and a half deep, and ten or twelve yards over: the second about three feet and a half deep, and twenty or thirty yards across, rapid, and with a bad footing, on account of the large round stones. Yesterday the passage was much more difficult ; but the water had gone down during the night : as it was, it caused no small terror to some of the Bagdad cockneys in my suite.

The passage, including the whole bed, occupied twenty minutes. We then left the zabit and his party to assist the takht-revan ; and after having regaled ourselves with a cup of coffee under the shem-sia, we rode on to the village, half an hour, or two miles * off, passing on our left an old minaret of beautiful brick-work, apparently of the age of the caliphs, and some ziyarets, or places of pilgrimage, which show this to have been once a very large place ; but the present village is very miserable. It contains a post-house of sixty horses.

Before coming to the Tchai or torrent, we saw, on our left, at the distance of two miles, the village of Ali Serai. A mile on our right, on the right bank of the Tchai, is the ziyaret of Zeen al Abedeen, much

* Mr. Rich's average rate of travelling was from three and a quarter to four miles an hour ; and frequently, on a short march, or at the end of one, the horses went four miles and a half. The hours of the caravans, which are what the natives reckon by, are three miles to the hour. A horseman's hour is three miles and a half.

The following note is taken from a memorandum-book of Mr. Rich's :—"The rate of going of a good tchapkoon or ambling roadster, timed exactly, is fifty measured paces in twenty seconds, which gives 150 to a minute, or 9000 to an hour. Allowing for the difference of the pace and the yard, it may be taken at four miles an hour. The tchapkoon I have ascertained to be the most equal and regular of all paces." resorted to by those afflicted with complaints in their eyes.

I was much indisposed at setting out, and scarcely hoped to get on so well to the end of the stage, which is called seven hours. We did it in rather less than five hours and a half. On arriving, I was received by a deputation, consisting of the elders of the place, headed by the mullahs; among them were some tall fine-looking old men.

My mehmandar, Mohammed Aga, always insists on holding my stirrup when I mount, notwithstanding my entreaties to the contrary. He says it is the service which he performs for Mahmood Pasha, and that he has been desired to consider me another Mahmood Pasha. He was the officer who last year commanded the detachment which took and plundered this village, when Mahmood Pasha was leagued with the King of Persia's son, the Shahzadeh of Kermanshah, against the Turks; and the poor villagers seemed anxious to propitiate him, in case of another such visit. Many came and kissed his hand; but the moment his back was turned, exclaimed, "May he never see good luck; he was the fellow who stripped us last year!"

Thermometer—morning 61°; at 3 P.M. 72°; at 10 P.M. 66°; wind in the morning E. Clear day. At 3, again overcast and calm.

May 2.—Having heard of some ruins to be seen in the neighbourhood, we resolved on inspecting them in our way this morning. We found them to consist of the Minaret, which we had noticed yesterday, and the remains of a wall of earth, the facing of brick-work having been taken away. We saw a gateway of small dimensions, but very beautiful masonry, in the taste of the Tekieh, the Mostanzeria*, and the finest remains of the time of the caliphs at Bagdad. These ruins are noticed by Olivier; but he most unaccountably transfers them to Toozkhoormattee. This would lead one to suspect that his Journal, or at least this part of it, was written from recollection. He, indeed, professes not to describe remains of antiquity; but he should at least remember where they are, if he mentions them at all. I must, however, in justice add, that this is one of very few errors, which I have yet discovered in his Journal, which, in its description of the face of the country, is laudably correct.

At the end of the village, on our road, we passed a little imaum† with a pine-apple spire, like that over the tomb of Zobeide at Bagdad‡, but by no means so elegant in its design and execution. The villagers told us of the ruins of a church, which is likely

* The Mostanzeria is a mosque at Bagdad of the age of the caliphs. The Tekieh is a convent of dervishes of the order of the Bektashi, which stands on the banks of the Tigris, on the west side of the town, and is a good specimen of early and pure Mahometan architecture.—Ed.

† A building dedicated to an imaum or Mahometan saint.—Ed.

‡ The celebrated wife of Haroon al Raschid, enough, as this was an episcopal see of the Chaldeans*, and bishops are mentioned at a very early period.

We saw the ruin which they pointed out as the church, about one and a half or two miles on the right, out of our road ; and as I satisfied myself by my glass that it was nothing remarkable, I did not lose time by going to see it.

We finally marched at a quarter past six. The country was covered with wormwood (yaoshan in Turkish) as yesterday, with some origanum, and many other plants, that I, ignorant as I am of these subjects, did not recognize. The wormwood sent forth a refreshing, agreeable odour. We saw much barley yet green ; and some few patches which they were preparing to reap.

Our road was north (leaving the Kerkook road on our left) to the foot of the hills. The Hamreen just in sight on our left. At twenty minutes past seven we arrived at the little mud village of Jumeila, which in Arabic means “ the pretty little one,” though the name ill suits it, as it is a wretched hole. We now began to ascend the range of hills, which run N.W. to the village of Matara, from which they take their name. They then pass by Tazeekhoor-mattee, and soon afterwards are said gradually to disappear.

* Vide Asemanni, art. Dakoka.

I now am happy that I came by this road, though it is three or four days longer than that by Ibrahim Khanjee, as I have learned many things which completely put me in possession of the skeleton of the country. I was surprised to find my mehmandar so intelligent with respect to positions of places, bearings, and connexions of ranges of hills. I tried him with some points which I already knew, and his answers satisfied me as to the reliance to be placed on his general information.

The other, or easternmost branch of the Kifri hills (which is, in fact, the main trunk or artery), passes by Kerkook, and Altoon Kiupri, thence runs off below Arbil to the Tigris, and is there called the Karatchukdagh. This eastern branch contains gypsum and naphtha. The Western, or Matara hills, are pure sandstone and gravel, and resemble in every respect the Hamreen chain most completely. They offer many circumstances worthy of note. On entering them in the pass of Jumeila, we rode through a ridge or two of perfectly vertical strata, looking as if they had been forced up into their present position. These are succeeded by some perfectly horizontal strata, also of pure bare sandstone, large blocks of which have tumbled out, and are strewn about; the rest look of a crumbling texture; and indeed the whole range bears strongly the appearance of a mountain in ruins. We next came to inclined strata, and, what is curious, the inclination of it is exactly as at the Hamreen. These hills slope to the east, at an angle of 60° from the vertical, or 30 below the horizontal. All the strata, throughout the chain, are exactly parallel, and have precisely the same direction, as if they had been drawn with a line N. 45 W. The ascent is very gentle, in an easterly direction; but winding in the narrow clefts worn by the rain in the sandstone.

We reached at twenty minutes before eight a dismal plateau, or wide extent of gravelly ruins, in heaps, and wild-looking furrows. Our road through it was N. 50 E. At eight we came to other ridges of inclined strata, answering the former description; but more and more covered with gravelly soil as we advanced. Here and there were patches of barley. We met a small Koordish caravan, laden with myrtle (mord), packed in bags; it gave out a delicious fragrance. It is used, I believe, in the dyeries.

The soil and gravel now predominated, as in the east face of the Hamreen; and at a quarter before nine we reached a spot, overlooking the plain of Leilan, where the hills slope gradually and gently down.

We now entered the plain of Leilan, the area of which is entirely occupied by barley, apparently in a very flourishing state. A very little of it was beginning to turn yellow. At half past nine we alighted, to take coffee, and to give our quarter-master time to make his arrangements.

At a quarter past ten we mounted again; and at a quarter before eleven arrived at Leilan; which is a small village, now belonging to Abdallah Effendi, formerly mutawelli or guardian of Imam Aazem*, an old acquaintance of mine. It was last year entirely plundered by the Persians and Koords, who burned what they could not carry away, in order to distress the foragers of the Turkish army. The villagers, I believe, all over Turkey always keep their grain in pits or wells near the village, which, when covered over and levelled with the soil, cannot be always discovered, even by the native armies, without some one to show them the spot.

From the terrace of the house where we were quartered I had the good fortune to perceive Kerkook, which I carefully set several times with the surveying compass of telescope sight, in order to be quite sure. The point I set was the castle hill; part of the town below it was visible through the telescope. Kerkook castle hill N. 24 W.

I was also anxious to ascertain the distance, as near as it could be given me by the people of the place. By my eye I should judge it to be about twelve miles in a right line. Abdallah Effendi, who has several times gone from Leilan to Kerkook, noting the time by his watch, says it is for a caravan of mules three and a half hours; for an ordinary horseman, three hours; and, at a smart walk of a horse, two and a half hours. This would be then ten geographical miles. By means of a good observation I had at night, I have now been able to satisfy myself as to the true position of Kerkook, which, from my former journals, and those of Sir R. Ker Porter, I had long been persuaded was placed too far westward by our maps. I find I was right in the position I had assigned it.

* Abu Hanifa, a celebrated doctor of Mahometan law, surnamed Aazem, or the Honoured, is buried at this place, which is about two miles to the north of Bagdad.

The country between Leilan and Kerkook is a perfect plain, with several artificial mounts scattered all over it. In some of the villages date-trees were to be seen, but few or no gardens. The plain is bordered on the W. by the Matara hills; and on the E. by the range which we are to cross to-morrow.

Tazee Khoormattee is three hours off.

The village of Leilan is worth annually about 25,000 piastres, Bagdad currency. Like all the other villages on the Koordish line, it is much harassed, and has been several times utterly ruined by the incursions of the Koords. The Kiahya of the village intreated me to use my interest with Mahmood Pasha to get back 300 of his sheep, which had been carried off by the Koords, and which he had heard were still undispersed. All the peasants pray that my visit to Koordistan may be the means of preventing any Koordish inroads, at least till they have got in their harvest. The people of this and all the neighbouring villages are of the Turkish race, and are Tcheragh Sonderans, or Ali Ullahees*.

Thermometer—at six A.M. 68°; at three P. M. 81°; at ten P.M. 67°. Wind S.E.

May 3.—We left Leilan at half-past five, and travelled in a N. E. direction along the Leilan stream, which we kept on our left. Its course from the hills is marked by a succession of mills, each of which has a small round tower of stone attached to it, which makes it look like a little fort. In one, a miller was crying out ‘Ver, Allah!’ Give, God!—the constant practice, I understand, when the mill is empty; upon which those who have grain to grind bring it to the mill.

In half an hour we reached the hills, which here rise at once from the plain, and form a plateau, proceeding from and skirting the east branch of the Kifri hills. This plateau is worn into narrow valleys and mounts, by numerous rills and rain-courses. The most considerable of the former is the Leilan water, showing by its rapidity the great inclination of the ground which it traverses: it has its source in the above-mentioned hills, and receives many smaller tributary streams in its course.

* See note, page 26.

All these valleys, especially that of the Leilan water, contain numerous little villages, embosomed in gardens of fruit-trees and roses, which at this season render them perfect little paradises. The base of the hills, or plateau, is sandstone; which here and there shows itself in strata inclined in the same degree and direction as those of the Matara branch of hills. Over this is a concretion, or conglomeration of pebbles, which, wearing away, forms a gravelly soil.

This tract is called the Banner or District of Kara Hassan, and is dependant solely on the Pasha of Bagdad, the Governor of Kerkook having no authority in it. It is worth about 85,000 piastres annually, and extends in length about six hours. The late war, and the constant inroads of the Koords, have greatly depopulated this district, and proved very destructive to agriculture. We saw some barley; but the greatest part of the country over which we travelled was covered with grass, mixed with wild rye, oats, and an infinity of wild flowers; besides thyme, mint, and peppermint. The higher parts and tops of the hills would make excellent sheep-walks; and the valleys afford fine pasturage for cattle. On ascending the plateau, the height of which above the plain was very inconsiderable, perhaps no where exceeding 300 feet, we were immediately struck by the marked difference in the appearance of the country, and in our own sensations. It was only now we could be said to have quitted the dreary Ghermaseer*, and I seemed to inhale a new existence. My feverish anxiety and listless despondency gradually passed away, like the clouds of a stormy night, and I revived to new hopes and renovated vigour: nor was I singular in my sensations. Mrs. Rich, who had been greatly indisposed, was quite restored by the time she arrived at the end of her day's journey; and several invalids of the party declared that they felt no more symptoms of illness after an hour or two's ride among the hills. At half past seven we descended into a valley formed by a little stream, which rushes down between the hills to join the Leilan water, when a scene presented itself which called forth a unanimous exclamation of rapture from the whole party. By the brook which turned a little mill was a small assemblage of cottages, completely embosomed in a wood of poplars, willows, fig, plum, and rose-trees, the latter all in full bloom. This grove was completely tenanted by nightingales, who joined their mellow voices to the murmuring of the rill. There is no mind, however brutish, but is affected by the beauties of nature. The principal cause of the Koords deserting their chiefs in their disgrace is the fear and irresistible repugnance they feel to quitting their country for the hideous desert of Bagdad.

* Or 'the hot country;' it is the name given to that tract of country which lies between the Tigris and Mount Zagros.

My Turks were loth to pass this valley without the enjoyment of a cup of coffee in so delicious a spot ; and I felt no objection to indulging them. We passed a pleasant half hour at this place, which is called Hussein Islam ; and then rode to Yusuf Aga's camp, half an hour farther on in the valley of Leilan. We arrived at half past eight. Our whole stage, deducting the half hour's rest, was two hours and a half.

Yusuf Aga, the present Governor of the district of Kara Hassan, is a Georgian, an old friend of mine, being the very person who came to my camp with Daoud Pasha's firmans and dispatches, during the revolution that ended in the destruction of Saed Pasha, and nomination of his brother-in law, Daoud, to be his successor. Yusuf Aga is now moving about his district seeking pasture for his cattle. He had made very handsome preparations for receiving me at his little encampment, where he entertained us in a most hospitable manner. We pitched our tents on an eminence over the valley of the Leilan water ; the banks of which were ornamented by a little grove or garden, as at Hussein Islam. The situation was really exquisite ; and in the valley we discovered a briar rose of England, the wild perfume of which was infinitely more pleasing to us than all the odours of the East.

Soon after my arrival a tchaoush was announced from Moosa Aga, the Governor of Kerkook ; which is about four hours or twelve miles from this place ; he was the bearer of a very polite letter of invitation from his master, requesting me to pass a few days with him. I understand he has made great preparations to receive me ; but I must, for the present, decline his invitation. We shall, in all likelihood, return by that road.

May 4.—I awoke this morning at half past four with a smart pain through the temples similar to that produced sometimes by suddenly swallowing a mouthful of iced lemonade : the pain went off as the day grew warmer.

At half past five A.M. we mounted. Our road was northerly, along the valley of the Leilan water ; into which we sometimes descended, crossing the little stream occasionally. The valley, which is narrow and winding, grew even more beautiful as we advanced ; and we often rode through lanes and coppices of mulberry, pomegranate, and other fruit trees, with rose-bushes interspersed. To judge by the breadth of its pebbly bed, which occupied nearly the whole of the valley, the Leilan water, now a mere brook, must be a considerable torrent when swollen by the rains. As we advanced, it received numerous tributary rills. The plantations continued for about three miles, and on the sides of the hills we saw some vineyards. The country was covered with wild thyme, wormwood, sage in flower, and a variety of other plants among the grass. The level very sensibly rose as we advanced.

At eight A.M. our course was N. 75 E. We now quitted the Leilan, which has its source hard by, and we crossed the range of hills in a N.W. direction. From the summits of these hills, the streams run down to Koordistan. Here the government of Kara Hassan terminates, and that of Sulimania in Koordistan commences. About nine we began to descend by a very direct, but not difficult road; and in twenty minutes we reached the first landing-place, if I may be allowed the expression. On an eminence on our right was a small building, a Ziyaret or place of pilgrimage, called the Mekam of Kidder Elias*,

* Or resting-place of the prophet Elias. The Mahometans believe that Elijah never died, and that he is still on the earth, where he is to remain until the coming of Jesus Christ. They call him Kidder, or ever-green, on account of the everlasting life which he enjoys, and by which he is kept ever in a flourishing condition, in a paradise which, say they, might be taken for Heaven itself. In reference to this a Turkish poet observes, "Keep yourselves from believing that this world is your home; your home is in Heaven alone; strive therefore by the means of virtue to reach that home where Elias dwells, and where a place is prepared for you."

The following striking anecdote, which is taken from the Bibliothèque Orientale of D'Herbelot, will surely be read with much interest by every Christian:—

When the Arabs had taken the city of Holwan, in the 16th year of the Hegira, 300 horsemen returning from this enterprise under the command of Fadhilah, towards the end of the day encamped between two mountains in Syria. Fadhilah, having intimated that it was time for evening prayer, began to repeat with a loud voice, the usual form "God is great," &c., when he heard his words repeated by another voice, which continued to follow him to the end of his prayer. Fadhilah, after he had finished; much celebrated among the Koords, who believe it to be impious to hunt in its vicinity. Hence we again descended by an extremely gentle slope to-cried out, "Oh thou who hast been speaking, if thou be of the order of angels, may the strength of God be with thee; and if thou be of that other class of spirits, it is well; but if thou be a man like me, make thyself known to me, let me see thee, that I may have the benefit of thy instruction." He had no sooner concluded these words, than an old man who was bald, and with a cane in his hand, and looking like a dervish, appeared before him. After they had saluted each other, Fadhilah asked the old man who he was: he answered, "I am here by command of the Lord Jesus, who has left me in this world, to remain here till he comes the second time. I wait therefore the coming of this Lord, who is the source of all happiness, and in obedience to his commands, I live on the other side of this mountain." Fadhilah, upon hearing these words, inquired of him when the Lord Jesus would come? The old man having answered, "at the end of the world, and at the time of the last judgment," the curiosity of Fadhilah increased, and he further requested him to tell him some of the signs of the near approach of that time. Kidder Elias, then addressing him in a prophetic tone, said, "When men and women shall forget their respective places; when abundance of provisions shall not lower their price; when the blood of the innocent shall be shed; when the poor shall ask alms and receive nothing; when love shall be extinguished; when the Holy Scriptures shall be turned into songs; and when temples dedicated to the true God shall be full of idols, know that then the day of judgment is very near." He had no sooner concluded these words than he disappeared.—D'Herbelot, Bibliothèque Orientale, folio, p. 732.—Ed.

These notions of the Mahometans are derived from the Jews. Jesus himself was taken for Elias, re-appearing after nine centuries of concealment. The prophecy that Elijah should come "before the great and terrible day of the Lord" has probably given rise to the notion, that he had not yet completed his part on earth. The wisest Rabbis have taught that Elias sits under wards the N E. to Tchemtchemal; a high artificial mount, which either gives name to, or receives it from the banner or district in which it is situated. We passed, on our way to this mount, much barley, seemingly in very good condition, but not yet fit for the sickle; a large plantation of lentils; and much pasture-land.

We reached our camp at ten A.M. It was pitched the tree of life in Paradise, and keeps account of the good works of the Jews, especially of their Sabbath observances. They conceive that his presence may be attracted by the due performance of spiritual exercises; they leave the door open that he may enter; and their chants on the close of the Sabbath are full of references to him, and petitions for his favour; the occasion of circumcising a child they regard as peculiarly interesting in the eyes of Elias. At such seasons his presence is besought, and a seat is kept vacant for him, which if all be rightly gone about, it is not doubted that he will occupy. It is told among them, R. Judah was once at a circumcision at Ratisbon, when perceiving, in virtue of his spiritual discernment, that Elias's chair was empty, he foretold that the child should come to no good; the child afterwards became a Christian. Attendance at this ceremony they hold to have been assigned to Elias, because of his zeal for circumcision; which led him to complain that "the children of Israel had forsaken God's covenant," (1 Kings xix. 14,) meaning the covenant of circumcision. On this account too they believe that he is called the angel of the covenant. It is remarkable, when viewed in connexion with the above Mahometan story, that the Jews, understanding Elias's coming "before the day of the Lord," to mean an appearance preparatory to the advent of the Messiah, consider revelations concerning that period to be his especial work, and at the close of each Sabbath, pray that on the next he would come and declare the circumstances of the coming of the Christ.—See Buxtorf's Synagoga Judaica, Basle, 1641, pp. 80, 255.—Communicated by a friend to the Ed.

on the nearly circular Mount of Tchemtchemal, which was capable of receiving a much larger camp than ours. As the plain continued to slope down towards the east the mount appeared highest on its eastern side. It rises nearly perpendicularly to the height of above 100 feet; but of what age it may be it is impossible to say. We picked up some pieces of pottery of a fine quality, and deep red colour; and a very large block of stone; but nothing to characterize the mount, which must be at least Sassanian, possibly even yet more ancient. We have, from its summit, where I am now writing, a fine view of the mountains of Koordistan, from Keuy Sanjak on the N. to Seghirmeh on the south-east.

The plain continues to slope for a little way beyond the mount, at the foot of which runs the Tchemtchemal tchai or water: beyond this, it rises again very gradually, but much broken into ravines and hills, to the Bazian range of hills; in which are the passes of Seghirmeh and Derbent. The latter lies just before us; behind it rises the mountain of Peer Omar Goodroon, forming part of a higher range, to all appearance bare and rocky. Goodroon is the highest mountain in these parts, and is said to contain a glacier, which supplies all Koordistan with snow, or rather ice, the store of which is inexhaustible, and never melts. We perceived snow in some of the clefts.

I will now endeavour to give some general idea of this part of the Koordish ranges of mountains, as they appeared from the mount of Tchemtchemal.

The line which we see immediately before us, extending from N. to S. E., is a narrow precipitous bare ridge, which is called the Bazian mountains. To the north of the pass of Derbent i Bazian, which, as I have already remarked, is just before us, the mountains soon make a turn towards the west, where they form the mountains called Khalkhalan, which bound the Pashalik of Keuy Sanjak on the south. To the south of the pass of Derbent, the ridge is continued in a straight line south and a little east. Here is another pass called Derbent i Basterra; beyond which the ridge, continuing in the same line, assumes the name of Karadagh, and becomes well wooded. Here is the third road into Koordistan from the plains of Assyria. It is called the Seghirmeh, or ladder, and passing directly over the crest of the mountain, has been esteemed difficult, if not impossible, for an army.

Abdurrahman Pasha, the late governor of Sulimania, fortified all these passes, at the time he was endeavouring to render Koordistan independent; but having been defeated at Derbent i Bazian by Kutchuk Suliman Pasha of Bagdad, his fortifications were demolished. Karadagh is bounded by the Diala. Just south of the pass of Basterra, the Zenghench hills come out west from the Karadagh, and are at first much lower: but turning south, as if to form a parallel line with Karadagh, they become of an almost equal elevation. Just behind this part, that is E. of it, appears a higher summit, belonging to I know not what range, which is part of the district of Dilleo. Just before, or W. of the high part, which to appearance forms the termination of the Zenghaneh range*, are little hills, scarcely discernible; where is Ibrahim Khanjee, and Ghilli on the Turkish frontier. Still farther W., the Kifri and Toozkhoormattee line of hills is seen coming up to unite with, but a little in the rear of, the Kara Hassan hills we have just left; which are prolonged a little to the N. † They then disappear by turning west; and leave an open horizon, as far as the Khalkhalan hills.

There were no villages discernible from Tchem-tchemal mount, they being all situated in hollows, by the sides of the little streams. The villagers are all now dispersed about, in little encampments of black tents, for the convenience of pasturing their cattle, and attending to their harvest. All cultivation in Koordistan is watered solely by the rains ‡, there being no artificial irrigation.

* Having a lateral view of the Zenghaneh hills, I could see that the strata of all parts of that range incline to the E in the same manner and degree as the Hamreen mountains.

† The road from Kerkook to Derbent, called the Ghisheh Khan road, passes over these hills.

‡ The kind of cultivation which is carried on by means of Thermometer—5 A.M. 49° ; 2 P.M. 79° ; 10 P.M. 59° . During the day, light N.W. breeze; night calm.—The cold was so great last night as to be pretty severely felt by our relaxed frames, though the thermometer at 2 P.M. was 79° : it however continued only half an hour at this height.

May 5.—There was a very heavy dew this morning, the first I had seen for many years. The sun soon after rising exhibited the curious phenomenon of an iris, formed by its rays acting on the morning mists. With the dawn appeared the high range of the Kandeel Dagħ in N. 10 E., which forms the Rewandiz, Akko, Sikeneh, and Saook Boolak mountains; and is, in fact, the prolongation of Zagros, forming the grand frontier between Persia and Turkey. They were covered with snow down to their apparent bases, and their points were broken and sharp.

We marched at half past five as usual, and proceeded in a N.E. direction to join the Kerkook road. There is a more direct road from Tchemtchemal to Derbent, the distance of which is three hours; but we preferred this one as being the easiest. The ground became more cut up and furrowed, as we advanced; and the soil was an earth of deep red rain is called by the natives Dem, which is an Arabic word. Rice and cotton must be artificially watered in countries where there are no tropical rains.

approaching to crimson, when seen from a distance. The ravines, which are very deep, are made by innumerable little rills, which flow from every direction. The surface is covered with grass interspersed with the usual herbs: we saw but little barley.

At 9 A.M. we arrived at the pass of Derbent, the approach to which is very marshy, and must be troublesome in winter. A small khan stands on the right hand, and just at the mouth of the pass is a square ruin or platform, with the remains of little vaulted cells in it, and some wells of water. This resembles the platform at Kasr i Shireen, and Haoush Kerek; and is undoubtedly, like them, Sassanian *. For curiosity's sake I asked the guard † at Derbent by whom he thought it was constructed, and he answered without hesitation, "By Khosrou."

The pass of Derbent is formed by a mere ridge, or wall, which advances as it were to close the valley, and slopes down very gradually, leaving but a small opening. This is a complete screen, facing the two sides of the opening through which the road to Koordistan leads.

The layers of the screen are in thin laminæ, and incline outwards, or to the west, with but a small inclination from the vertical.

* See Appendix.

† There is a guard at the pass of Derbent, who take twelve paras on every load that passes. No such demand, however, was made from us.

This pass, as I have already mentioned, was fortified by Abdurrahman Pasha. He placed here a wall and gate, and three or four pieces of cannon, two of which were planted on the height, in order to fire upon the Turkish camp below ; and vain would have been Suliman Pasha's attack on this pass, had not a Koordish chief called Mahommed Bey, a son of Khaled Pasha who was united with the Turks, led a division of the Turkish troops and auxiliary Koords up the mountain, by a pass only known to some Koords, and which had been neglected as impracticable ; so that Abdurrahman Pasha found his position turned, and his guns on the height pointed against himself. He was then obliged to retreat, and the wall was razed by the Pasha of Bagdad, who afterwards advanced to Sulimania.

Having enjoyed the refreshment of a cup of coffee at the Derbent*, we marched again at half past nine. The valley soon became open and winding, having the Bazian hills on each side. The strata all inclined towards the west, and the hills were, I believe, calcareous. On the left at some distance in the hills is a ruin, called Sheitan Bazar, which is composed of a range of little cells. This, and another called

* The government or banner of Bazian commences at a ravine and little stream called the Red Valley, half an hour west of the pass of Derbent.

Gheura Kalaa, also on the left of the valley among the hills, are, from the descriptions, unquestionably Sassanian remains.

The mountain of Goodroon was before us, a little on our left. About 10 A.M. we turned into a branch of the valley, which is here very wide, to the village of Derghezeen, where we arrived in about a quarter of an hour. From the door of our tent was visible, towards the north-east, about three-quarters of a mile distant, another artificial mount, exactly like that at Tchemtchemal, called Gopara.

The government of Bazian reaches to the summits of the hills north-east of us under Goodroon, and there joins that of Soodash. In these mountains are many deer, wild goats, bears, and leopards or panthers.

The cultivation about Derghezeen* consists principally of rice, cotton, sesamine, and tobacco. There are innumerable little rills fresh from the hills near the village, which water the valley. Some vineyards were observable in the hills.

Thermometer—at 5 A.M. 56° ; 2 P.M. 78° ; 10 P.M. 54° ; calm or light easterly airs.

May 6.—At half-past five A.M. we marched, the morning being calm and overcast. As the road wound much on account of the mud, I did not set our course till we arrived at the straight road to

* So called from its being originally a settlement of the Derghezeenli Turkomans.

Sulimania ; from which point I knew the village we had left was visible*.

We directed our course across the valley, from the western side where Derghezeen is situated, to the eastern hills, along the foot of which we afterwards kept. Our progress was very slow, on account of the muddy and marshy places formed by the multitudes of rills, which flow from every direction. Soon after leaving Derghezeen, we crossed a very pretty stream, which, coming through a hollow way in the rocks, tumbles down a few feet, and forms a small cascade. This is called the Devil's Valley. At half-past six we passed, close on our right, the village of Lazian, or Lajan, and soon after we fell into the direct road to Sulimania. The village of Bazian, which is reckoned the capital of the district, though a wretched mud place, like all the Koordish villages I have yet seen, lay to the north-west of us, under the hills, at about two hours and a half distance. Our road was S. 30 E. This valley, which is about three miles broad, affords fine pasturage, but little or no cultivation was to be seen. The grass was quite young and fresh, and none of the grain we have seen since entering Koor-distan is nearly fit for the sickle.

We kept the hills, which bound the valley on the east, close on our left hand. We had intended to have gone to the village of Teinal, a place on the west side of the valley, about three hours and a half from Derghezeen; but when we came nearly opposite, at the place where we should have crossed over to it, our mehmandar, from some information he had just received, judged it most expedient to proceed on to Taslujee, in the vale of Sulimania. Accordingly, at nine we turned off to the north-east, and immediately ascended the hill we had hitherto kept on our left all the morning. The ascent and descent were stony, but not precipitous, and at half-past nine we entered the vale of Sulimania, a fine green plain, about eight miles across, which wants only wood to make it really beautiful. The town of Sulimania was visible under the hills which bound the valley on the east, the range of which Mount Goodroon is a part.

* There is a road to Sulimania down the valley of Derghezeen, keeping on the western side of it ; but the mud was said to be still deeper there than by the road we took.

Our progress to-day was slow and difficult, on account of the muddy and stony ground; and it was 10 A.M. when we arrived at our place of encampment, which was near a mount called Kerespeh Tepeh—that is, the black mount, exactly like those at Tchemtchemal and Derghezeen. These mounts are probably royal stations, marking the progress of an army; perhaps of that of Xerxes or Darius Hystaspes*.

From my walks yesterday, and my journey to-day, I begin to understand a little the frame-work of this country ; which has been the scene of so much that is interesting in history, and is so unknown in the present day, that I think it advisable to state the result of my observations. That part of Koordistan which is enclosed between the Bazian and Karadagh range of hills on the west, and the Goodroon range on the east, is subdivided into valleys running nearly S.E. and N.W., all of which terminate and have a common issue at the Pass of Derbent. These valleys are formed by small subordinate ranges of hills, dependant upon, though not extending, the whole course of the greater ranges above mentioned. The first valley is that of Derghezeen, having the Bazian range on the west ; then comes the valley of Sulimania, separated from the other by a line of hills not so high as those of Bazian. The valley of Derghezeen* is subdivided by a still lower range of hills, which does not extend far south ; and near Sulimania another line of hills comes out, leaving a valley between them and the Goodroon range. The Bazian mountains increase in height as they go south, the Karadagh appearing higher still ; and it is bounded by the river Diala, where the territory of the Pasha of Zchai begins. The plain of Sulimania appeared open to the south, where it has for its boundaries the snow-clad mountains of Avroman*, which are a part of Taurus and Zagros.

* Vestiges of ancient buildings are visible at a place called Kerwanan, on a hill in the plain.

* In the plain of Derghezeen the mehmendar pointed out, under the western hills, a stream, which, uniting with several others, and passing through Derbend i Baserra, joins the Taook Tchai.

That part of Mount Goodroon which is just over Sulimania is called Azmir; on the east side of which is Karatcholan, the old capital of the province, in the district of Shehrizour. On the east side of Goodroon is Mergapa, a pleasant village in the hills, about six hours from Sulimania, which has been recommended for our summer-quarters. Goodroon† appeared to be of a dark colour, rocky, and precipitous. The summit consists of a hollow, or basin‡, in which the snow lodges and consolidates into ice§.

If this sketch be not correct in all its details, it will, at least, give a good general idea of the country, and may serve as a groundwork for future inquiry.

Thermometer—5 A.M. 55°; 2 P.M. 66°; 10 P.M. 60°: calm and cloudy; afternoon, showers of rain; steady soft rain till after midnight.

* These mountains are the frontier between the territory of Sulimania and that of Sinna, a province of Koordistan under the government of Persia.

† The mehmandar insists that the Azmir or Goodroon mountains go as far as Keny Sanjak, Amadia, and Mardin. He may not be wrong.

‡ I think it is a crater, but I propose to myself a nearer examination.

§ A perpetual store of ice is thus kept ready for the use of the inhabitants of Sulimania, who make great use of it during the summer to cool the fruit, sherbets, water, &c.

May 7.—At ten minutes before six we mounted, and directed our course towards the Goodroon chain, but in an oblique direction, in order to avoid the mud, which was said to be very deep in the lower parts of the plain. The morning was clear, with a gentle northerly breeze. Shortly after leaving our camp we were met by Abdurrahman Aga, one of Mahmood Pasha's gentlemen of rank, sent by his master to relieve our travelling mehmandar, and to conduct us to Sulimania. He had ten or twelve servants with him; and, after the usual interchange of compliments, we marched on together.

Our road lay over hills sent forth by the Goodroon mountains, interspersed with valleys, and well watered by numerous little brooks, some of which, being dammed up, are made to rise above the level, and are then drawn off to form rice-beds. We saw a good deal of barley growing, but it was yet young. At eight we crossed a broad, but shallow torrent, which descends from Goodroon, and in autumn is quite dry, called Tchaktchak, as my conductor informed me, because the pebbles found in it strike fire.

At five minutes past eight, we came to the Sertchinar, a fountain by the roadside, which bursts from the earth in more than fifty little springs, and becomes almost immediately a considerable stream; murmuring over the pebbles, and making, to my ears, a most delightful sound. This stream runs through the district of 'Tchemen 'Tangeroo*, where a great deal of rice is cultivated, into the Diala; and, indeed, may be said to be one of the streams which contribute to form that river. In its progress through the vale of Sulimania it becomes the property of one man, Yunus Bey, on whom it was conferred by the present Pasha. The lands it waters are worth annually more than 50,000 piastres; and much rice, cotton, sesamine, and tobacco are cultivated by means of its waters.

Above the sources of the stream is a knoll or hill, on which stand two trees, which are said to mark the site of a battle fought in very ancient times. The Koords say that Ali planted his spear on this spot after an engagement with the Infidels; but Abdurrahman Aga acknowledged that there was only Koordish tradition for this, though he thought there was no doubt of there having been a battle here, but between what powers he pretended not to know.

In compliance with the wishes of the Pasha, we encamped on the left bank of the Sertchinar, till he could make preparations for our entry into his capital, which he has settled is to take place to-morrow morning. Mahommed Aga, our old mehmandar, here took leave of us. He has greatly endeared himself to us all by his kind and gentlemanlike conduct during his officiation.

* A Koordish corruption of the Persian Taj rood. The town or village of Tanjeroo is one hour distant from Sulimania.

AN OFFICER OF THE PASHA OF SULIMANIA.

Published by Duncan Paterson & Co. Ross.

Shortly after we had encamped, great stores of all sorts of provisions, for ourselves and our people, came in from the Pasha; and at noon Omar Aga, another Koordish officer, arrived. This gentleman is to be our attendant during the whole of our stay in Koordistan*. After having had an interview with me, and settled concerning our abode, during our residence in Sulimania, he returned to town to make preparations for receiving us. From what I have seen of Koordish gentlemen, both at Bagdad and since entering their country, I am inclined to think very favourably of their manners and hospitality.

In the afternoon I took a walk to look about me a little. Around the head of the Sertchinar the water bursts from the ground in every spot; and wherever I removed the earth water gushed forth †. The bed of the stream is full of water-cresses, and the stream itself contains abundance of fish, among which were trout, from the description given us by our anglers, who saw many, but found them too shy for their clumsy tackle.

The Sertchinar ‡ is only separated from the

* See Plate, No. I.

† The temperature of all these fountains, for I tried several of them distant from each other, was 62° Fahrenheit, the thermometer standing at the same time at 76° in the open air.

‡ On the E. of the Sertchinar, separated from it by a little hill, in like manner as it is from the Tehaktchak on the W., is another Tchaktchak by a little eminence, on which is a burying-ground that to all appearance has not been used for a long time. I thought of the fine description of the old burying-ground, in the prologue to "Old Mortality," as I wandered among the rude grey stones of this cemetery, between which the ground was covered with wild flowers. Three or four spreading trees adorn this eminence, and great was my delight in discovering them to be oaks!—not, indeed, of the well-known British species, but fine trees, fully sufficient to call forth many precious recollections. The leaves are less indented, smoother, and of a darker green than those of the oak I have been accustomed to see in England; yet it is not the dwarf oak. It is said there were many of these trees about the Sertchinar formerly, which were cut down for the building of Sulimania.

Thermometer—5 A.M. 53°; 3 P.M. 76°; 10 P.M. 64°. Fine northerly breeze and clear weather.

May 8.—We marched at forty minutes past five, and pursuing our way gently along the foot of the hills, with much ascending and descending, we arrived at our camp before Sulimania at forty minutes past six, where I was received by several Koordish gentlemen belonging to Mahmood Pasha, who, having made their compliments, immediately went away, stream, but less than either of the others. This and the Tchaktchak are only torrents, which are, I believe, dry in autumn. They all unite in the plain.

except two who were left to attend on us. We had anticipated some trouble from the crowd, the Koords being celebrated starers, and we the first European party most of them had ever seen here: not a soul, however, appeared, except those who were on duty. This, I understood, proceeded from an order of Mahmood Pasha's, strictly enjoining the Koords to give us no trouble. I had but little rest to-day, and the draft on my spirits was rather more than they could answer. I had scarcely sat down in my tent, when in came an express Tartar from Constantinople. I had rather he had shown himself at any other time; especially as, bringing the news of the king's death, it was requisite to forward on the dispatches immediately*.

I had scarcely recovered from the arrival of the Tartar, when my old friend, Abdullah Pasha's chief officer, arrived; and he again was succeeded by Mahmood Masraff, the prime minister of the Pasha of Sulimania—a very celebrated character in Koordistan, of whom I had often heard at Bagdad. He came with the information that his master himself was coming at *aasser, to pay me the first visit, and welcome me himself to his country. This was quite an unlooked-for honour, and was a great proof of his friendly and hospitable disposition. I had not expected even that he would return my visit; but coming himself to me in the first instance I had considered as totally out of the question.

* As illustrative of the suspicion and fear of treachery ever prevailing in the mind of an Eastern governor, it may here be mentioned that Daoud, Pasha of Bagdad, had been much alarmed at the idea of Mr. Rich's going to Koordistan. The reasons given did not satisfy him; for no Turk ever thinks of travelling for health or amusement. He evidently suspected evil against himself; and the arrival of this Tartar from Constantinople, just on Mr. Rich's arrival in Koordistan, is said strongly to have confirmed his fears. —Ed.

I accordingly made the best preparations my situation would admit of to receive Mahmood Pasha; and shortly after aasser his approach was announced. The sight was a gay and barbaric one. He alone was on horseback; and, being a very small man, was almost hid by the crowd of tall Koords, habited in every colour of the rainbow, but chiefly in pink, yellow, and scarlet, which hues especially made up the tassels and fringes which covered their heads. The march was silent, and yet their tread was heard from afar. When my guard saluted, the Pasha immediately returned them the compliment, by laying his hand on his breast with considerable dignity. I sent my tchaoushes to meet him, and advanced myself beyond the door of the tent to receive him. As soon as he saw me, he alighted from his horse, his tchaoushes shouting out; and shaking hands with me with both his hands, we came into the tent, and sat down together on a shawl, which I had prepared for the occasion. It was with difficulty, and only after some time, that I could persuade him to adopt the easier mode of sitting and crossing his legs: he wished to persist in the more respectful and difficult attitude of kneeling, resting on his heels. He welcomed me again and again to Koordistan, assured me that the country was mine, and many other such Eastern compliments. Many civil things, of course, passed,—on his part in apologies for his country, and on mine in praise of it. I at least was sincere; for I really was charmed with the verdant hills, and delighted to be out of Bagdad. I then gave him the Pasha of Bagdad's message, which, being a very civil one, I took care to deliver audibly before all his attendants, and he seemed sensible of the attention. He spoke of the state of the country; exposed the difficulties with which he had to contend, in being placed on the frontiers of two rival powers, one of which never ceased persecuting him for contributions,—the other, his natural sovereigns, that is the Turks, insisted that he should neither serve nor pay Persia; and yet Turkey was neither able nor willing to defend him, when the Shahzadeh of Kermanshah carried on his exactions by force. He pointed out the pernicious way in which this combination operated on the prosperity of the country, in a modest and sensible manner; and expressed his wish of adhering with fidelity to the cause of the Pasha of Bagdad. I believe, in fact, that personally he is well inclined to the Turks from religious prejudices;

* Or afternoon prayer.

but it is easy to see that their cause is not very popular, and that the generality here have neither respect nor confidence in the Ottomans ; nor do they deserve it. Their political conduct is blind, arrogant, and treacherous. With a little prudence and conciliation, and by a skilful application to the Sunite feelings of the bigoted Koords, who detest the Persian sect, they might have attached firmly to them a brave and numerous people—who possess the most important lines of their frontier—and who, at particular moments, might turn the scale in favour of the power whose cause they espoused. There is at present a game going on, the intricacies of which it would be difficult thoroughly to unravel ; but it is evident that it is a kind of ruse contre ruse affair. The Pasha of Bagdad is endeavouring to cheat the Pasha of Koordistan and the Shahzadeh of Kermanshah—while the Shahzadeh is cheating both the Pasha of Bagdad and the Pasha of Koordistan ; and all of them, both collectively and severally, are endeavouring to cheat the Porte, who will unquestionably come off worst of the whole set, and who in every thing contrives to make herself the common enemy. With this, however, I had nothing to do. The situation I held obliged me to uphold Turkey, at least negatively, which in my answer I endeavoured to do. The Pasha, after a short silence, and I thought as if he were really affected, then said, “ My father, of blessed memory, loved you much ; he would have rejoiced to have seen this day, which he often anticipated ; and I could have wished it had been he who received you, instead of me." I answered, that Abdurrahman Pasha was a much-esteemed friend of mine, and that I greatly respected his memory ; but that his place was worthily filled. A due allowance of callioons having been smoked*, sherbet, incense, and rose-water were brought ; and he retired in the same manner as he had come. Before he took his leave, he told me that, if it were agreeable to me, he would wish me to enter Sulimania the day after to-morrow, at 9 A.M. I perceived at once that he had an astrological superstition about this, which, of course, I indulged him in.

Mahmood Pasha has nothing distinguished in his person or address ; but he is a plain, reasonable, and, at the same time, a mild and gentlemanlike man ; and they say his private character is unexceptionable, which is not ordinarily the case with the Koords.

The whole day was a considerable trial to my weak nerves ; however, but for the arrival of the Tartar, it would not have been unpleasant. The scene was novel and interesting ; the Koords were far from being troublesome, and I gleaned some information from several of them.

The Pasha followed up his visit by a large present of sheep, and other provisions for all my establishment. He has resolved not to let me purchase anything as long as I remain in his dominions ; but this I mean to put a stop to, as soon as I have had my public audience.

* The Pasha is one of the few Koords who use the Persian tube, all the rest smoking the common Turkish pipe.

Thermometer—5 A.M. 60° ; 3 P.M. 79° ; 10 P.M. 67° ; fine N.W. breeze.

May 9.—I was occupied all the morning in writing public and private letters, and in dispatching the Tartar.

In the afternoon my old friend Abdulla Pasha* came to see me. He has suffered a long and painful illness, and was scarcely recognizable. He held me locked in a fast and earnest embrace for some time, and was so much affected as not to be able to speak for several seconds. I too was shocked at the ravages which disease had made in his appearance ; so that the meeting was but a dismal one at first, though we both soon warmed as we talked about old times. It was easy to see that the members of the Bagdad government, and particularly Daoud Pasha, were not very high in his favour ; nor do I wonder at it. He has been very ill-treated by the Turks, and no doubt will find some opportunity of repaying them with interest. He spoke of his nephew, the present Pasha of Sulimania, with respect and seeming kindness ; but I thought I could perceive a little embarrassment in his manner. He passed more than an hour with me ; and, at parting, grasped my hand with great energy.

* An uncle of Mahmood Pasha of Sulimania.

Thermometer—5 A.M. 56° ; half past 2 P.M. 78° ; 10 P.M. 61° ; wind easterly, but moderate.

CHAPTER III.

Osman Bey—Entrance into Sulimania—Visit to the Pasha—Description of our House—Attachment of the Koords to their Chiefs—Anecdotes—Partridge Fighting—Afghans in Shehri-zoor—Xenophon and the Ten Thousand.

May 10.—THIS was the morning which the astrologers seemed to have decided upon as the proper one for my entering into his capital, and public reception by the Pasha. About half an hour before the appointed time, the celebrated Osman Bey, about whom I had heard much, the Pasha's younger and more dashing brother, came to conduct me into town, accompanied by all the members of council on horseback, and an immense party of Koords on foot. The Bey was magnificently mounted on a very fine Arab horse, which he got from the Anazee Arabs, and which is said to have cost him 13,000 piastres.

All the people were gaily clad. I was much struck with the appearance of the Bey. He was not large, but lightly and well made; the outlines of his face were perfectly regular; he had a crispy or wavy black beard, dark blue eyes, with black eyebrows and lashes, and a manly tint of brown over a fine, clear, and ruddy complexion. He was altogether a very handsome young man. In horsemanship, and all their favourite military exercises, he is said to be unrivalled among his countrymen. He is likewise famous for his courage and generosity ; but, on the other hand, he is reported to be rather dissolute in his morals, and tyrannical in his disposition.

Hemet met me with an easy and polite address, in which was something of frankness, but not the most distant tincture of coarseness. He was perfectly well bred in his manners. I could see he was well aware of the advantages of his person. He was magnificently attired in the Koordish taste : his gown was of a rich, flowered, gold Indian stuff ; he had a superb Cashmere shawl ornamented with gold fringe on his head, put on in a wild loose manner ; his upper dress was a capot, or cloak, of crimson Venetian cloth, with rich gold frogs, or bosses, on it. The age of Osman Bey is thirty-two ; that of his brother, the pasha, thirty-five. Their mother is a sister of Khaled Pasha, and consequently also of the principal branch of the Bebbeh* family.

Osman Bey was disposed to talk rather more freely of the state of Koordish affairs than I chose to encourage ; and it was easy to perceive he was not of the Turkish party. He looked at his watch several times in the course of the interview, and seemed anxious that we should not miss the precise moment of mounting. At last, when they told him it was the appointed instant, we rose together and set forward in the following order :—

First a guide ; then my trumpeter and standard-

* The name of the pasha of Sulimania's clan ; so called from their ancestor, Bebbch Suliman.

bearer*; then three led horses, followed by my imrahor, or master of the horse; next came my tchaoushes, or running footmen, fully armed; after whom marched the sepoy with their drum and fife. I followed mounted on Finvar, with two stirrup-holders, armed with battle-axes and shields; then came Mr. Bellino and Dr. Morando; then Osman Bey on his beautiful Arab, with a line of about three hundred Koords after him on foot: after the bey and his people came the members of the pasha's council: my khaznadar, or treasurer, and mounted attendants, closed the procession. We moved forward, in very good order, towards the city, if such it might be called, which was not above a quarter of a mile off. The crowd assembled to witness the procession was immense. I did not think the town could have contained such a multitude; yet the most perfect order prevailed. The police-officers of the darogha's † train dealt around, I thought very unnecessarily, sundry blows with their heavy clubs, each one of which seemed sufficient to have felled an ox. Yet I alone appeared to be annoyed at this mode of opening the march; the Koords, on whom the blows fell like hail, received them on their heads and shoulders with as little feeling as an anvil. In this manner we arrived at the palace; the entrance to which is low, mean, narrow, and dirty, to a degree which I thought ill accorded with the residence of a governor, or even of a common individual : but I understood that it is not without its use in a country like this, and that it renders the seat of government defensible, in cases of emergency. The entrance does not lead to the front of the palace, but turns round the side of it*; and here I was obliged to alight, as we could get no farther on horseback. We advanced up a handsome flight of steps into the hall of audience, which, had it been in good repair, would really have been a superb room. It was open in front on pillars †. The pasha met me at the door, and conducted me to a chair at the upper end of the room. Mr. Bellino and the doctor were seated just below me, on chairs likewise. The members of council, headed by Osman Bey, sat on a broad nimmud, or thick felt carpet, on the opposite side, and my people arranged themselves interspersed among the pasha's officers, who were in double rows all round the room, in the centre of which stood the Ishik Agassi, or master of the ceremonies, with his staff of office in his hand. A crowd of well-dressed Koords filled the passages and the court below outside the room. After the introductory compliments, the pasha saw I admired the room, and remarked that it was built by his late father ; that it wanted repair ; but, said he, “ Who will repair what he is not certain to enjoy ; and what may in a few days afterwards be ruined by the Turks or Persians ? ” He told me the palace owed its elevated situation to its being built on an artificial mount, of great antiquity *. The view from it was very agreeable. I endeavoured to keep off politics, and to lead the pasha to speak upon the economy and antiquities of Koordistan ; and I happened to make a fortunate hit at the outset. I told him I had heard that the Vali of Sinna † was of a Gooran family ; and that the Gooran race ‡ were not so much esteemed as clansmen. A murmur of applause burst instantly from all the attendants and went round the room. My fortune was now made with the clannish Koords ; and the pasha, with more than his usual vivacity, went at once into the history of his family. He said, in the first place, that the Vali of Sinna’s family was very ancient, but that the Goorans were not a tribe : that he boasted himself of being both of an ancient family, and of an honourable clan. The name of his clan, he added, was Kermanj ;

* The standard of the cross was borne by a Turk, and English marches were played by a Persian trumpeter, who was no bad performer.

† The chief of the police.

* There is a better (but still crooked) entrance in front of the palace, which is now under repair.

† This kind of apartment is called a Talar.

* Probably the fellow to those I had remarked at Tchetchemal, Derghezeen, and Taslugée.

† The governor of the province of that name in Persian Koordistan.

‡ The people of Koordistan are divided into two different races : the one consisting of the tribes, the other of the peasants or Goorans.

Bebbeh being the appellation of his own particular family, the members of which are the hereditary chiefs of the clan ; and hence their whole territory and people are now called the government of the Bebbehs or Babans. The clan was originally established at Pizhder, in the northern mountains near Sikeneh on the frontier of Persia. An ancestor* of his, he said, had rendered important services to an Ottoman sultan in a war with Persia ; and obtained in recompense an investiture of all he could conquer. He and some succeeding chiefs gradually possessed themselves of the districts they now hold, with several others which have since been retaken by the Persians ; and the whole was then erected into the banner of Baban, or Bebbbeh, and made dependent on the pashalik of Shehrizoor, the capital of which was Kerkook. The pasha could not give me any dates, he only knew that his ancestors were lords of the Banner for a long time ; and were finally made pashas of two tails not quite a century ago. He told me the Gooran race were easily distinguishable by their physiognomy, and by their dialect of Koordish. We had much more conversation of this kind, and parted exceeding good friends ; and all the

* It was Suliman Baba, or Bebbbeh. He went to Constantinople about one hundred and twenty-five years ago, A. D. 1678, and becoming celebrated for the services he rendered the Turks against the Persians, his family were afterwards called by his name, Bebbbeh or Baban, instead of the name of their tribe, which, as has been already observed, is Kermanj.

pasha's cousins, that is, his clansmen, seemed to look upon me with great satisfaction.

At the door I found a handsome horse, well caparisoned, prepared for me, which I could not dispense with accepting: it was accordingly led before me. And we now went to inspect the house which had been prepared for us: this was close by the palace, and turned out to be a very dismal place; spacious enough indeed, but ruinous and filthy. Such as it was, it was the dwelling of one of the chief officers of the palace, who had been dislodged to receive us. My repugnance to take possession of it was, I believe, very visible. After some whispering between the Koords and my people, the pasha sent his prime minister to request I would let my khaznadar or treasurer go about with one of his officers, and choose any house in the town, the owner of which should be instantly dislodged to make room for me: but I could not bear the idea of this; and, besides, I was unwilling to give any further trouble. I considered that the difference in the dwellings here must, after all, be inconsiderable; and that the pasha had, in all likelihood, in the first instance, done the best for us he conveniently could: I therefore resolved to make a virtue of necessity, and put up with the proposed house; and immediately saw that my determination gave general satisfaction.

I now, therefore, sent Minas to escort Mrs. Rich into town, for the Koords had a great objection to my returning back again to camp to-day. It was easy to see that they had some superstitious idea of ill luck to their affairs if I left the town: so I passed, till Mrs. Rich's arrival, two or three hours very unpleasantly in walking and lounging about, which confirmed the nervous headache with which I had been threatened in the morning.

The description of our house will serve for that of all the better sort in Sulimania: it is a square building of one story, standing on a basement of about three feet high, and built of bricks dried in the sun, having a plastering of mud mixed with chopped straw over the whole. One or two rooms inside have been white-lined over the mud coating. The roof is flat, and is formed by rafters, reeds, and a coating of earth. This house stands in a large open enclosure, or as we would say in India in a compound: this is subdivided into two courts by a cross wall, which joins the house at each side near its centre, leaving the front in one enclosure and the back in another: this makes the Haram* and Divan Khaneh †; but there is no communication between them by a door in the house itself, as in all Turkish houses; you must go round by a door in the wall which divides the compound into two: this is peculiarly inconvenient in bad weather. The area of both courts is covered with grass, and planted with willows, poplars, mulberries and rose bushes, interspersed in little bouquets. A stream of water runs through the court of every house in Sulimania, which is supplied from the mountains by a kahreez or aqueduct. With respect to the distribution of the rooms, it seems regulated by no plan, at least I am not able to discover any order or contrivance in it; only that in both the haram and divan khaneh is a talar, or room quite open in the front, which is the general receiving and sleeping room in summer. No one but the poorest persons, who have not such an accommodation in their houses, sleeps on the roof. Some, indeed, in the greatest heats, which only last a month, use a sekoo, or low platform, for that purpose; and, during summer, many construct tchardaks, or huts made of boughs, over a little tank in their own court-yard, or else pitch a tent, to escape from the fleas, which are a terrible nuisance all over the East, and are said to be peculiarly formidable here.

* The women's apartments.

† That part of the house where the master receives his visitors, and in which the men servants reside.

In the divan khaneh part of the house is a large vacant space or hall, supported by posts, and almost dark: this is said to be a cool retreat in summer, but the pest of the fleas must still exist, and another still worse, that is scorpions, which are said to be numerous, large, and venomous. Centipedes are also found here, but I believe are not much dreaded; nor are the snakes, which are large and numerous, said to be venomous.

The winter rooms of the house are entered by a long dark passage : their appearance does not render one desirous of a nearer inspection ; indeed, I keep as much as possible on the outside of the house.

The ordinary houses are mere mud hovels, which makes the place look like a large Arab village : they are perfectly exposed, but the people do not seem to regard this, the women going about with the men, and performing their domestic labours without any veil. This miserable-looking town, however, contains five khans, two good mosques, and a very fine bath. The population of Sulimania is estimated by the best judges among the Koords at ten thousand souls, including the officers of government and retainers of princes residing here. The ordinary citizens are of the peasant race.

As soon as the baggage arrived, I pitched a large two-poled tent for a divan or receiving room ; and when ornamented with my arms, and covered with a handsome carpet and nimmuds *, which the pasha was kind enough to send me, it made altogether a kind of barbaric receiving hall of no contemptible appearance—certainly much pleasanter and better looking than any room in the town. The sepoy pitched tents also in the court; and some of the people, who did not relish the appearance of their quarters, followed their example.

* Narrow strips of thick soft felt, handsomely ornamented with various colours, which are placed round the rooms in Persia and Koordistan, and serve instead of sofas and chairs.

In the haram our preparations for the first night were not so fortunate. We tried the most airy-looking room; but alas! the heat, close smell, and swarms of sand-flies soon showed us the folly of our attempts, and we drew our beds out into the talar: here again we were unsuccessful in our efforts at repose. We were kept awake till daybreak by these Koordish tormentors; though a few hours' sleep would have been a real blessing to me in my state of nervous pain.

Thermometer—5 A.M. 62°; half past two P.M. 75°; 10 P.M. 68°; south wind in puffs; disagreeable feeling day; a little rain.

May 11.—Many Koordish gentlemen came to see me, from whom I gleaned various particulars concerning their country. Amanullah Khan, the Vali of Sinna, once asked Abdurrahman, Pasha of Suli-mania, to tell him why it was that his own servants, though generously treated by him, would never follow him into exile, nor ever, under trials and privations, showed any attachment for his person, such as the Baban Koords had always manifested for their princes. The answer of old Abdurrahman Pasha was very characteristic. "You are not," said the old chieftain, "the lord of a tribe, nor are your men your tribesmen. You may clothe them, feed them, and make them rich, but they are not your cousins; they are but servants!"

The attachment of the Koords to their chiefs is indeed very strong. In Bagdad they live with their masters in the most miserable exile, struggling, without a murmur, with every sort of privation and suffering. Gentlemen who, in their own country, have a horse handsomely caparisoned, and a servant, are seen in Bagdad in rags; and are frequently known to work as porters or water-carriers, that they may take their day's wages to their master, to contribute to his support. When the brother of Abdurrahman Pasha died in Bagdad, one of his Koords was standing on the terrace or flat roof of the house, at the moment his master expired. "What," said he, "is the Bey dead? then I will not live another moment!" and immediately he threw himself off the top of the house, and was dashed to pieces. I have often heard this anecdote related in Bagdad. Yet an exile in Bagdad is what the Koords most dread, and even their attachment is not always proof against its terrors. Poverty and privation they can endure without a murmur; but the burning wastes of Arabia are to them, they say, truly dreadful. The other day, when Koord Suliman Pasha very foolishly allowed himself to be inveigled into Bagdad once more, after having repeatedly had proofs of the falsehood and treachery of the Pasha, some of his Beyzadehs, or gentlemen of the first rank, came to him and told him that they were ready to undergo anything for his sake but the horrors of a long-protracted Bagdad exile, and that they desired leave to depart and seek their fortunes, with the other princes of the same family in Koordistan. When their masters are in power, they distribute the best part of the lands among these their faithful followers, and, besides, make them continual presents of horses and arms. Khaled Pasha told me that when he was deposed from the government of Keuy Sanjiak, his gentlemen came to him with their silver-mounted trappings and silver horse furniture, which they laid down before him, telling him that he was now going into exile at Bagdad, where they would follow him, but where they would have no need of such finery; and that they therefore requested he would use the silver to provide himself with funds.

I had to-day confirmed by several of the best authorities, what I had long suspected, that the peasantry in Koordistan are a totally distinct race from the tribes, who seldom, if ever, cultivate the soil; while, on the other hand, the peasants are never soldiers. The clamish Koords call themselves Sipah, or the military Koords, in contradistinction to the peasant Koords; but the peasants have no other distinguishing name than Rayahs* or Keuy-lees†, in this part of Koordistan. A tribesman once confessed to me that the clans conceived the peasants to be merely created for their use ; and wretched indeed is the condition of these Koordish cultivators. It much resembles that of a negro slave in the West Indies ; and the worst of all is, I have never found it possible to make these Koordish masters ashamed of their cruelty to their poor dependants.

* Literally a subject, but generally used for a peasant.

† A villager.

Every one agrees that the peasant is in a moment to be distinguished, both in countenance and speech, from the true tribesman ; nor would it be possible for him to pass himself for his countryman of nobler race.

Mahommed Aga said to me, “ The Turks call us all Koords, and have no conception of the distinction between us ; but we are quite a distinct people from the peasants, and they have the stupidity which the Turks are pleased to attribute to us*.” The treatment which the peasantry receive is well calculated to brutify them : and yet tyranny equally degrades and brutifies the master and the slave ; and it were not wonderful had the tribe and the peasant Koord been equally stupid and unfeeling.

During a conversation concerning the great Koordish families, one person present said, “ Is it not a shame that our princes should ever consent to go to Bagdad, where they are obliged to submit to a Turk, who was bought the other day, like a beast, for a few hundred piastres, and who yet, when in a passion, will call any of us ‘Koordish ass!’” Another person remarked, “The jealousy of our princes is their ruin. Neither the Turks nor the Persians would ever be able to do anything against us, but by availing themselves of our divisions, and the family jealousies of our chiefs. We are aware of this, and yet, somehow or other, the Turks always succeed and get the better of us. We are certainly Koords with thick understandings.” The same person said, when I mentioned the dirt and ruinous condition of the house I was living in,—“It is very true; but why should we build good houses, or keep them in good repair, when we are not certain of enjoying them even for our lives? This Pasha is changed, another of the same family is appointed, and he brings in his friends, who turn us out of our houses and estates. The ruin of this country is the want of stability and permanence of its governors. Of whatever disposition a prince might be, it would be well for the country if he were sure of preserving it for life*.”

* Referring to a common saying among the Turks, that a person is as stupid as a Koord.

In the afternoon Mahmood Masraf came to entertain me with a partridge fight. This is a very favourite diversion of the Koords; and the Masraf, who is a famous sportsman, when he heard that I had never seen a partridge fight, was quite delighted to have an opportunity of showing his collection of game partridges, which is a very fine one. He came first, attended by four of his sons, all very fine tall young men. The old gentleman looked quite respectable amongst his fine family; and he was not a little pleased at my making the remark. "Oh, sir," said he, "I have three or four more of the lads in the house, who will have the honour of kissing your hand one day." I was surprised to see the un-eastern freedom of the sons before their father. They all put themselves at their ease, and smoked their pipes without the least ceremony. From what I had seen among the Turks and Arabs, I should not have thought they would even have sat down in the presence of their father.

* It may not be superfluous to mention here, that the Pashas of Sulimania must be all of the house of Bebbch.

After a round of coffee and pipes had passed, the approach of the army, as the old gentleman called it, was announced by a prodigious cackling and crowing of the partridges, which was audible for a great distance off; and soon a party of stout Koords appeared, bearing on their shoulders thirty-two cages, each containing a cock partridge. The collective and incessant cackling or crowing of this party caused a strange noise, something like the ticking of a thousand immense watches: they were not silent an instant, except when fighting. A number of lads of the fancy followed, all eagerness for the sight; and more would have rushed in, if, to spare the clubbing and cudgelling, by which alone they could be kept back, I had not ordered the doors to be closed.

The cages were placed round so as to form a ring, behind which the spectators stood; the old Masraf, his sons, and myself closing the circle on the side of the tent. The scene would have suited the pencil admirably; but as it would be out of the question to attempt to sketch on the spot, I must see the sight a few times before I can attempt to give a graphic idea of it.

One of the assistants now opened the door of a cage, and let out a bird, who whirled himself up in the air as if in defiance, and then strutted about waiting for his adversary. Another partridge being let loose, they fell to. The sight was amusing and by no means cruel. It was highly entertaining to see the little birds strut about on tiptoe in defiance, jump up, bite at each other, play about to seize a favourable opening, and avoid letting their adversary take hold on a bad place. I observed the great feat was to get hold of the nape of the neck. When a partridge succeeded in seizing his adversary in this manner, he would hold him like a bull-dog, and sometimes lead him two or three times round the ring. Sometimes a bird would be frightened and run away out of the ring. The battle was then fairly lost; and the bird so beaten will not feel disposed for fighting for two or three months afterwards. Every bird had its own name; and their wings were not clipped. They were so tame as to allow themselves to be handled without resistance; and when a match was over, the birds would return to their cages almost of their own accord. They never spurred; all their attack was an attempt to seize their adversary. The Koords looked on with great interest; but after the novelty was over, it seemed to me but a puerile diversion. The Koords are keen sportsmen in horse-racing, partridge, ram, and dog fighting. Mahomet, like a true Arab, made it lawful to lay money on horse-racing; but the Koords carry the license still farther, and allow of betting on their partridge and dog fights.

After the exhibition was over, two officers came to report themselves, as appointed by the Darogha to command a patrole of fifteen men, who were to keep constantly going round the outside of our house all night. To enable them to pass our Sepoy posts, they had made themselves acquainted with "Who goes there?" and—"A friend." It was really curious to hear Koords in Sulimania endeavouring to pronounce these English words, which they had learnt from Mahometan natives of Hindoostan, and subjects of Great Britain. They told me they also knew what the countersign was, having learnt the meaning of it in Persia. Their corps de garde they established without any ceremony on the roof of a neighbouring house; and walked over all the adjoining roofs, and through the families of the occupants, whenever it suited them. To have remonstrated against this abominable tyranny would have been fruitless, nor would the motive have been understood, either by the offenders or sufferers—to so low a degree is the human species debased by a long course of savage oppression. Aga Minas to-day happened to ask one of the police-officers in attendance if some sort of a bedstead could not be procured? “Certainly,” said the man; and, without more ado, he went to the first khan, and seized three bedsteads belonging to Bagdad merchants, who happened to lodge there. He brought them in triumph to the house. It is needless to say that the bedsteads were immediately returned to their owners.

Thermometer—5 A.M. 66° ; half-past 2 P.M. 70° ; 10 P.M. 68° ; wind S.E.; some showers of rain, with thunder and lightning.

May 12.—This morning I went to the bath, which I found remarkably handsome, well lighted, and well served; superior to anything I have yet seen in any part of Turkey, excepting Damascus, Cairo, and Constantinople, and in some particulars even excelling them. It was stuccoed, and painted in arabesque, and ornamented with large cisterns or basons of water, with jets d'eau. It was built at the expense of the present Pasha, by Persian architects brought here on purpose; and it is said to be the exact copy of the new bath at Kermanshah. Another, on the same plan, was constructed in the Pasha's own harem. A Mahometan willingly spends money about a bath. It is a kind of pious work ; and therefore even adverse armies would never think of injuring it. The property also may be well secured by making it vakuf*.

We find the temperature of Sulimania very agreeable. Thermometer—6 A.M. 66° ; half past 2 P.M. 78° ; 10 P.M. 69°. Squally from the west, with showers of rain and thunder ; much rain and very vivid lightning in the night.

May 13.—After breakfast I went to see my old friend Abdullah Pasha. He seemed a little better, but still extremely languid. He spoke with no feelings of pleasure of Bagdad recollections ; and upon his relation, Khaled Pasha, being mentioned, he said, “ He has been so long in Bagdad that he has lost all traces of clanship ; he has become no better than a merchant.” Abdullah Pasha is not remarkable for anxiety after information ; yet to-day, for the first time, he asked me a whole round of questions, beginning with Tcheen Matcheen, as the Mahometans call China, and going on to the relative strength and situation of the European powers. It was evident that some conversation on these subjects had taken place among the family; and my friend wanted to prepare himself for the next discussion.

* An assignment, in this case fictitious, to religious or charitable purposes.

When I came home, I received some Koordish friends, before I went into the harem. Mahommed Aga said, "The want of security in our possessions is the sole ruin of the country. While we tribesmen are not sure of holding our estates, we never will addict ourselves to agriculture; and until we do, the country can never prosper. Why should I, for instance, throw a tagar of seed into the ground, when I am not sure that my master will hold his government, and I my estate, until the season of harvest? Instead of doing this, I allow the peasants to cultivate my estate as they may find it convenient; and I take from them my due, which is the zakat, or tenth of the whole, and as much more as I can squeeze out of them by any means, and on any pretext."

Abdurrahman Pasha's favourite project, at one time, was to render his country tributary to the Porte, but independent of any neighbouring Pasha. He was willing to pay any annual tribute that the Porte might require, regularly and in ready money, at the capital, provided he should be secured from obeying any other orders than those of the Sultan; and not be subject to deposition, and interference in the interior of his province, except in case of rebellion; but this he could never manage. On occasion of the rebellion of Kutchuk Suliman, Pasha of Bagdad, against the Porte, the Reis Effendi, who was sent from Constantinople to depose him, offered Abdurrahman Pasha the government of Bagdad; but the old chief very prudently refused the honour. "It is true," said he, "that I should become a vizir of the first rank; but one draught of the snow-water of my own mountains is worth all the honours of the empire. Besides, were I to transfer myself to Bagdad, my own prosperity would be increased, but it would ultimately be the ruin of the family of the Bebbehs."

In the afternoon I went to pay a visit to Osman Bey. His establishment of servants was really magnificent; but the house was just like ours, though in better order, and raised on rather a higher basement. He does not lose on a second interview. I thought him very agreeable. He asked very sensible questions, and answered those I put to him in a very intelligent manner. He apologized for his inquisitiveness. "I am perhaps impertinent," said he, "but remember what a strange thing it is for a Koord to have a conversation with an Englishman; and what a desire he must have to profit by it, and inform himself of things which he could learn in no other way, but which it must do him good to know." I desired him to ask on; and assured him that I would take a similar liberty in return. He was extremely inquisitive about England, France, and Russia; our government, the ceremonial of our court, and the formation and constitution of our armies ; about which he asked many very pertinent questions, which showed that he took an interest in the subject, and comprehended it. Unlike the Turks, he by no means attached an undue degree of importance to the Sultan, Constantinople, or Turkish affairs. He asked for the particulars of the battle of Waterloo, about which he had heard, probably from the Persians, but not by name. Bonaparte he had heard of as the Imperatol. He then came to China, and asked nearly the same questions as Abdulla Pasha had done in the morning, which confirmed me in my suspicions of a conversation on the subject having taken place among them. He particularly asked if foreigners were allowed to visit the capital of China, and seemed rather surprised when I told him an embassy from our court had lately been there. On something being suggested to him by a person present, he entered on the subject of British India, but with some apparent caution. He began by remarking that when a sovereign had so powerful an army as ours, it was natural he should wish to employ it ; and that he was not surprised we were always looking out for opportunities of conquest. I saw immediately what he was coming to, and told him that our great army did not proceed from the inclination of the sovereign, but was no more than was necessary for our own defence ; that when other powers kept up large armies, it was indispensable for us to do so likewise ; and that we did not wish to interfere with any one else, but would not allow any one else to interfere with us ; that we had already more dominions than were essential to our welfare ; and retained some portions of them merely because we could not resign them, without their falling into the hands of those who would use them to our disadvantage. “ If that be the case then,” said he, “ how comes it that you are every year extending your conquests over Hindostan ? But I hope,” he added, “ you will not take amiss the questions I ask.” I told him that our conquests in India proceeded from the very principle I had just laid down. We were not the first Europeans who had conquered places in India. Some of the places we now held we had taken from those Europeans, in consequence of our wars with them in Europe ; others they had ceded to us ; some we had purchased ; others we obtained from the natives by treaty, in return for services or other advantages. Thus, from small beginnings, a mighty empire was formed, which bordered on the territories of many powerful princes. Some of these profited by us, and were friendly to us, others again were jealous of our power, and envied a prosperity, which they were not enlightened enough to attain. When people are neighbours, interests must frequently jar, and subjects of quarrel arise ; and though the English are peaceably inclined towards those who are similarly disposed towards them, yet they are not a people to be imposed upon. The necessity of defending our rights, or vindicating our honour, had often produced wars, in which it had generally pleased God to grant us the victory ; but that in all such contests, it would be found, we were never the aggressors. He seemed much struck with this view of the subject, and confessed he had, previously, always imagined that the English had at once sent a large army to conquer India, and carried on their conquests without cause, or even pretext, whenever they chose. He then asked me about air-balloons ; and said he had been told they were machines capable of conveying detachments of soldiers to any given point. We then came back to England. Nothing delighted him so much as the knowledge that we had clans among us. He was very minute in his inquiries into the manners, language, and character of our ashaier or tribes, and requested me to tell him some of the names of the clans. He was charmed with the idea of clan regiments, with their own costume and officers, but wondered that the reigning caste should be English, who were sheherlis or townspeople, and of no tribe ; and still more that they should make good soldiers. His asking me where we got our rice, introduced the mention of the New World ; and he immediately requested me to tell him how it was discovered. “ By astronomy and geometry,” said I, “ it was ascertained that the world was globular like an orange.” This part of my explanation I illustrated by holding up my clenched fist: "Here is Frenghistan—there is India—this is the way we come from Frenghistan to India; but some people began to inquire, why can we not go round the other way to India? Some said it might be done, others that it could not. An individual more enterprising than the rest said he would try it, and he found a prince who gave him ships and means to make the experiment. In endeavouring to go round this untried way to India, the new continent was found." This he entirely comprehended. In explaining to him the nature of the American republic, he said, "This is like the tribes in Khoshnav*, where each village has its own head, and they all meet together to consult for the good of the whole community."

* The tribes of the Khoshnav are three in number, viz., Meer Mahmalli, Meer Yusufi, and Pezhderri. The two former have an old feud between them, which keeps them constantly at war with each other, to the great advantage of the Bebbeh Pasha, who can only maintain his influence among them by dexterously availing himself of their internal dissensions, just as the Turks and Persians maintain their influence over him. A small stream separates these tribes; and they have one common mosque, in which they assemble on a Friday, and afterwards frequently retire to their respective sides of the rivulet and commence firing on each other. On one occasion, however, they commenced hostilities in the mosque, and twenty or thirty of them were killed.

In their dress they resemble the Koords of Amadia; but their language partakes both of the Bebbeh and Bahdinan dialects. The same remark holds good of the Rewandiz Koords, the name of whose principal tribe I cannot learn. There are, I believe none of the peasant race either in Khoshnav or Rewandiz.

When I told him no one sat in the presence of our king, "What!" said he, "not even your ulema"*? No, said I. "You see," said he, turning round to some of his people present, with an air of satisfaction, "Mullas have not much power in his country." He talked much of the state of Koordistan. "My country is in a wretched state," said he. "If you serve the Turks, they insult and depose you when they choose; if you serve the Persians, they are continually teasing you for money." He is a good Koord; but of the two rival powers, it is evident he prefers the Persians. At parting he was extremely friendly, said he considered me as of the same tribe with himself, and hoped for a continued intimacy between us.

When I came back I attended the elegant recreation of a dog-fight, and it was amusing to see the eagerness of delight of the Koords, who hallooed, shouted, and capered, and made much more stir than the animals themselves. One of the dogs† belonged to my sporting friend Mahmood Masraf, who having heard of a famous dog at Keuy Sanjiak, had lately sent off a man there purposely to procure him, to match with a dog here, who is rather too strong for any now in the place.

* The doctors of the law.

† They were of the rough shepherd-breed.

Many Koordish gentlemen attended ; one of them said to me, “ You are the first Englishman we have seen here, and the event will be talked over by our sons’ sons. We are delighted to have you among us.” The sentiment was echoed by the whole company.

Thermometer—5 A.M. 62° ; half past 2 P.M. 76. Gentle westerly air ; fine day.

May 14.—The Pasha called on me this morning, and sat with me for about an hour. He improves much on acquaintance. There is something serious, mild and unobtrusive in his manners, which is very pleasing. He inquired much about the European states in the same way his brother had done yesterday, and began his discourse with questions about China. There had been some talk among them about China, which has evidently interested them greatly. He talked with great modesty and propriety on all the subjects he treated of. I led the conversation to the subject of vaccination, which I am very desirous of introducing into Koordistan, where the small-pox commits great ravages ; and he expressed considerable anxiety for its introduction among his people. I promised him to write to Bagdad immediately for some of the matter.

In the afternoon my old sporting friend the Masraf came as usual. He also made his début in the evening’s chat with questions about China.

The Koords are the only orientals I ever knew who sit up late at night, and rise late in the morning. Few gentlemen in Sulimania go to bed till two or three o'clock, or show themselves abroad till nine or ten in the forenoon. Their chief visiting time is at night. When it grows dark they begin going about to each other's houses, where they amuse themselves with conversation, smoking, and music. They will pay two or three visits of this kind in the course of a night. About an hour before sunset also, a kind of club or assembly is held before the house of the Masraf, in an open place in the town called the Meidan. Friends meet and chat on various subjects; arms or horses are displayed; and sometimes matches are made of wrestling, partridge or dog-fights. The Koords appear to me to be a remarkably cheerful social people, with no kind of pride or ceremony among them; and they are neither envious of one another, nor have I ever heard a Koord speak an ill-natured word of another, however different they may be in party or interest.

While the Pasha was with me to-day, I took the opportunity of finishing an affair which had been recommended to my good offices by a friend whom it was impossible to refuse. A Bagdad speculator, who is in the habit of cutting timber on the Koordish mountains, had lately a considerable quantity of timber seized by the Koords. The Pasha at my request ordered the property to be restored; or if not forthcoming,¹ a similar quantity to be cut down and placed at his disposal. This transaction made me acquainted with the wood-cutting business, which includes some particulars I think worth knowing.

The timber, which is tchinar, or oriental plane, of a fine damasked grain, is cut on the mountains which separate Sinna from Turkish Koordistan, principally in the districts of Juanroo and Delli Havar, which is a valley in the mountains of Hallabjee. Forests are public property in the East; but the neighbouring chiefs generally contrive to exact something, in the way of presents, from the speculator, by throwing all kinds of dangers and obstacles in his way. The wood is cut, cleaned, and left to dry. A year or two after, at the time of the rising of the waters, it is carried to the nearest station, where it is floated down to the river Diala—men attending on the banks to see that it takes the proper course. When it reaches the Diala it is left to its fate, and floats down to the bridge between Bagdad and Tauk Kesra, where it is taken out by persons on the watch, but of course a great deal of it is lost in this way; however, so dear is timber in Bagdad, that it is generally sure to make a handsome profit. Mulberry and nut is also cut in Koordistan, but these are purchased out of gardens. Poplar or kawak is brought from Jezira* and Amadia; and willow, or sughuit, from the Euphrates above Ana,

* For an account of some places in Jezira, and the adjacent Wood is now becoming daily more scarce on the mountains of Sinna, from the indiscriminate cutting down practised by every one. My informant says, that in many places where he used to cut wood, there is now not a stick left. Lately a man in Kermanshah, who practises founding, casting and coining, has greatly contributed to the destruction of the plane forests, fancying that nothing but charcoal made of tchinar would answer his purpose. This has been much worse for the woods than even the timber-cutting.

The agents for cutting wood never venture to carry money with them into the forests. The workmen are all paid at Hallabjee *, which is the nearest town in the district. The people of these mountains, especially at Juanroo, are described to be in the last state of barbarism. They are nominally subject to the interesting but little known country, see Appendix. Among the rest, the castle of Finik, at about four hours above Jezira, is celebrated in the history of the Koords as early as 1461. In 1450 Khalapi, Prince of Seurt, laid siege to Jezira, and in 1459 Ameer Ahmed, the Bohtan, who occupied the Carduchian mountains, says Assemanni, took Jezira from Ameer Ibrahim, who took refuge in the castle of Phineck. In 1461 a battle was fought between the chiefs of Hesn Kief and Bohtan in the woods of Jezira. In the same year Ahmed the Bohtan, the tyrant of Jezira, took Fenek, and ordered Ibrahim with his sons to be burnt. It is remarkable that Ammianus Marcellinus, in lib. xx. 15, 18, 26, mentions Bezabde or Jezira and Phænica.

* Hallabjee is at the end of the vale of Shehrizoor towards the mountains, S.E. of Sulimania.

Vali of Sinna, but in reality are wholly independent, living in forests and fastnesses, and having nothing to tempt visitors. They cultivate nothing, and are reported to live wholly on acorns and wild fruit. What is perhaps singular in this kind of savage tribe, the women have great power among them, and will often appease furious disputes between the men, which would otherwise be terminated in bloodshed ; for, like all savages, these people are extremely irritable and vindictive, and count the life of a man for nothing. Men and women live together without the slightest affectation of concealment ; and the Bagdad timber-merchant was extremely scandalized at the questions constantly put to him of “ What is your wife’s name ? how does she dress ? ” &c. The account of this man was confirmed to me by many Koords present, who had visited that wild district.

I was surprised to hear that, in the province of Shehrizoor, there are some villages entirely composed of Afghans. They came into this part of the country on the murder of Azad Khan ; and they are said still to retain their own language among themselves. They are very poor, and rank among the peasantry. There are also some families of Afshars * in Koordistan. I saw an agavat, or gentleman of the tribe ; his name was Isa Aga, and he was an uncommonly fine-looking old man, of a commanding height and figure. Though bred up in Koordistan, I was told it could at once be perceived he was no Koord by his language. No one but a native-born Koord can speak their language perfectly ; it is something like the English in that respect. The difficulty in both proceeds from minutiae in the pronunciation, and running one syllable into another.

* Nadir Shah’s tribe.

May 15.—Last night a courier to the Pasha arrived in three days from Bagdad. He brings the news, that Mahmood Pasha's mother has been well received by the Pasha of Bagdad, and that his proposals are likely to be acceded to. He has, in the first instance, obtained the cession of the district of Kara Hassan, and the delivery up of Hassan Bey *, with a promise of Erbil and Altoon Kiupri. Bauker Khan, who has been here for some time on the part of the Shahzadeh of Kermanshah, to demand 30,000 tomans, will consequently be dismissed.

Mahommed Aga told me some curious anecdotes, especially of the escape of Hassan Bey last year, which placed in a strong light the treachery and impolicy of the Turkish government.

In the afternoon I had a visit from Bauker Khan. He is a plain, stupid man, with a most preposterous beard. He is of the Koordish race, of the tribe of Mafi, and speaks Koordish better than any other language. I asked him about the ruins of Hersin. He assured me that there was only a reservoir cut out of the rock; but that there were no figures or writing whatever.

* Mahmood Pasha's younger brother, who the year before had run away to Bagdad.

The afternoon's party exhibited all the fashion of Sulimania, to the number of twenty-five or thirty of the principal people. By way of recreation they had a partridge-fight. The birds were more numerous, and fought better than on the former occasion. The best fighters must be taken in the nest, and trained up. On the day they are to fight, they are kept hungry. In the summer they must be taken to the mountains, otherwise they lose their spirit.

May 16.—I called on the Pasha this morning. I like him better every time I see him. He has promised to do his utmost to procure me a copy of the famous History of Koordistan, called the ‘Tarikh al Akrad.’ I told him the story of Xenophon and the Ten Thousand, and the ancient glory of his race. He and all his Koords listened with the greatest attention, and appeared deeply interested in the narrative. The scene was very picturesque, and would have made a fine subject for a painting. The Pasha afterwards very naïvely exclaimed, “I wonder if my family was of consequence at that period!” There was present Kai Khosroo Bey, chieftain of the Jaf tribe, a very powerful and warlike clan. The Bey was a very fine-looking man. I was certainly the first European he had ever seen, and he was evidently much astonished; but there was no rude nor stupid staring.

May 17.—I returned Bauker Khan's visit. He lives at the house of the Darogha; as wretched a house as the one we inhabit. Bauker Khan told me that his tribe, the Mafi Koords, is established in Khorassan; but that there are some families of it in Kermanshah. His language differs from that of Sulimania, but is perfectly intelligible. Bauker Kkan is well acquainted with Khorassan, Afghanistan, and some parts of Turkestan, about which he told me some curious particulars; also about the turquoise, or Firouzeh mines of Nishabour. The turquoise matter is a small vein between two slabs of rock. Mohammed Rahim Khan, the present chief of Kharezm, is a descendant of Abdul Gazi Khan Bahader*, the celebrated Tartar historian. The proper title of the Sultan of Bokhara is not Sultan, but tura.

* A prince of the house of Tchenghiz Khan, who reigned about the middle of the seventeenth century. He wrote a genealogical history of the Tartars, which has been translated into various European languages.

CHAPTER IV.

Conversation with the Pasha—Kai Khosroo Bey—Koordish Tribe of the Jafs—Climate of Sulimania—Breakfast with the Pasha—Population of Sulimania—Firing at a Mark—Takhti Suliman—Ancient Excavations—Musical Party—The Zor Khaneh or Gymnasium—Dinner at Osman Bey's—Oriental prayers—Suliman Bey—Feats of Swordmanship—Agriculture—The Ramazan.

May 18.—I PASSED a very pleasant hour and a half with the Pasha. There is something so very natural, unassuming, and modest in his character, that makes it quite delightful to talk with him, after being used to the artificial, false, and pretending manners of the generality of men of rank in the East. I asked him why he did not wear armour, which is the favourite war-dress of the Koords. “Because I am not strong enough to bear it,” answered he. Most natives of the East would have said that they did not like it, or that they scorned shielding themselves in battle. A person must have lived long among the Turks, and have become well acquainted with their habits of thinking and speaking, to be aware how this little trait struck me. I have nothing to record of the conversation this morning, as it principally devolved on myself; the Pasha making many inquiries about European armies, with very judicious remarks.

In the evening I had as my guest Kai Khosroo Bey, in addition to my usual party.

The Jaf tribe*, whose chief he is, inhabit the highest mountains† on the frontier of the territory of the Vali of Sinna. They are a fine-looking, brave people, but esteemed exceedingly uncivilized and barbarous, even by the Koords. Their dialect of Koordish differs considerably from that of the Bebbeh Koords; and their appearance is so singular that they are easily recognized. They form a body of yeomanry cavalry, in number about 2000, which follows the Bey when he is summoned to attend his feudal lord, the Pasha of Sulimania, in the field. They can also turn out 4000 musketeers with ease; and they are reckoned the best soldiers in the Koordish army. As they are a strong and powerful tribe, they have a number of refugees from various tribes, with remnants of broken tribes, under their protection; such as the Feileys and Kelhores, who often do injury to the Jaf name. When the chief dies, if his son is young, he does not succeed, as the clan could never be governed by a stripling. In that case the vacant chieftainship is filled by the brother or uncle of the deceased Bey.

The Jafs all live in tents‡. In the summer they

* See Plate 2, a Man of the Jaf Tribe.

† The district of Juanroo, above alluded to, is a part of these mountains.

‡ The Koords call a wandering tribe, or one that lives in tents, Kheil; and a man of such a tribe Kheilekee.

Painted by J. Hallmandel

A MATE OF THE OF THE

Published by Hancock, St. Peter's encamp in the high mountains of Hagee Ahmed, on the frontier of Sinna: in the autumn they are scattered over the district of Shehrizoor; and in the winter they live at Shirwaney, on the river Diala.

May 19.—Nothing particular occurred in the morning. In the afternoon I had a visit from Abdulla Pasha. As he is not remarkable for his information respecting his own country, there is not much to be gleaned from his conversation. He spoke of the climate of Sulimania. In the winter the cold is sometimes intense, especially when the strong easterly gales prevail. Snow sometimes lies on the ground from six weeks to two months; one fall succeeding another before any be dissolved. The winter before last it snowed twenty-three times. In the summer the climate is pleasant, except when the easterly wind blows; which it does with prodigious violence, sometimes for eight or ten days successively. This wind is as hot and relaxing in summer as it is cold and piercing in winter; and, what is very curious, it is not felt at the distance of two or three hours off in any direction. The district of Shehrizoor*, where

* The province of Shehrizoor extends to near the mountains of Avroman. Its capital is Koolambar, called by the Turks Ghulambar; but the people who reside in it are obliged to retire in the summer to Khoajall, a cool situation at the foot of the Avroman mountains.

From Sulimania to Arbet is thirty hours; here begins the province of Shehrizoor. From Arbet to Ghulambar, where it terminates, is eight hours. At Arbet, Abdurrahman Pasha dug up quan-

a great deal of rice is grown, is said to be extremely hot and unwholesome, and overrun with swarms of flies and musquitoes ; besides which, so numerous are the snakes, that they may be commonly seen passing backwards and forwards along the road even in the daytime.

May 20.—I had a visit to-day, among my usual friends, of a Georgian, Teimir Aga, one of the slaves of Ahmed Kiahya, who escaped from Bagdad on the death of Ali Pasha ; and he has had the prudence to remain here ever since. He is now considered as a Koordish Agavat or gentleman, and holds several rich villages by gift from the present and late Pashas of Sulimania. He would not return to Bagdad even were he offered the best employment under the government, and seems to be perfectly satisfied with his condition.

A very respectable old Koord, who had just returned from Mecca, also came to see me. All the titles of bricks, but without inscriptions, and found some coins, a specimen of which I am promised. At Ghulambar he found two pieces of cannon buried in the rubbish. The district of Shehrizoor abounds in vestiges of antiquity, such as mounts or tepéhs, like Ghevra Kalaa on the Zehav road, and khareezes or subterranean water-courses, many of which are still serviceable. Sepulchral urns are dug up in many places. Arbet is the place where the most considerable remains are found. There is a mount there, and the traces of a considerable town round it. My present opinion is, that this is the ancient city of Shehrizoor ; but all the Koords with one accord deny there ever having been any city of the name of Shehrizoor, and insist that it was always the name of a district, as at present. The district is not now one government, but is divided among several.

Koords who have been the pilgrimage ever after wear a white turban. Within the last three years about two thousand Koords from the province of Sulimania alone have visited Mecca.

I had afterwards a visit from Osman Bey, who sat with me till noon, listening with the greatest delight to stories about European armies and battles.

Many of the offices about the Pasha are hereditary; at least during the government of the particular Pasha. The present Masraf was prime minister successively to Osman, Abdurrahman, and Mahmood Pashas; and he tells me he expects his son to succeed him. The present selikdar, or sword-bearer, is a boy, and a person acts for him till he is of age, administering also for him the laws attached to the office, which he has inherited from his father. If peace and the succession in the direct line were secured, this country would rapidly improve.

In the afternoon I joined the Masraf's coterie, established under a tent in an open place before his house. Most of the people of rank belonging to Sulimania were there. We were soon joined by Kai Khosroo Bey, who came lounging, or rather rolling in, with a vacant stare. He spoke by fits, in a language which I could not understand, though I now begin to make out the Sulimania dialect pretty well. Kai Khosroo Bey had a small English powder-flask, the mechanism of which he could not comprehend, and requested me to explain. I observed, on this occasion, that the Koords called gunpowder derman, or medicine ; a very efficacious one truly. We had afterwards, as usual, a partridge-fight. The skill, courage, and intelligence of the little bird is certainly surprising. As I have already mentioned, their great feat is to seize the adversary by the nape of the neck, hold him fast, like a bull-dog, and then fly up with him and overturn him on the ground ; and the skill exhibited in the attempting and evading this manœuvre constitutes the interest of the sport. One bird being foiled several times in his attack, in a paroxysm of rage seized himself fast by the wing, and was with difficulty brought to let go his hold ; thus realising what has been thought preposterous in Harpagon.

When I returned home the Masraf sent me a horse as a present. The Koord who brought it had been desired by his master not to accept of anything, and it was by main force that I caused him to be seized, and a dress put on him. There was something very ridiculous to see a shaggy savage, six feet high, actually blubbing at having a gift forced on him against his will. I sent some of my people home with him to appease the old gentleman, and to request him to allow his servant to accept my present.

May 21.—This morning I breakfasted with the Pasha, by invitation, at ten o'clock. The repast might have passed for a good substantial dinner, there being all sorts of meat, of the most solid as well as ornamental description. Among the rest was the usual Eastern delicacy, of a lamb stuffed and roasted whole. The dishes were prepared and served in the Persian fashion, and really did honour to Koordish skill, being much less greasy and more tasty than anything I ever ate at Bagdad. The Pasha and myself sat together at the upper end of the hall, and before us was placed an oblong tray of painted wood, with feet raising it a few inches from the ground, on which the different dishes were placed. Some that it would not contain were put on the ground beside us. Several bowls, filled with different kinds of sherbets, all cooled with snow, and some of them extremely palatable, were distributed among the dishes. By the Pasha a stout grim-looking Koord knelt on one knee, and kept stirring about a white mixture in one huge bowl, into which he put an immense quantity of snow. Ever and anon the Pasha turned about his head to him, and was served with a prodigious spoonfull of this mixture. The attentive stare of the fellow, as he delivered the contents of his Patagonian spoon into his master's mouth, was so ludicrous, that I durst not look at him a second time. I had also my attendant savage on my side ; and on turning my face towards him, in imitation of the Pasha, I was served with a spoonfull of the liquid, which proved to be diluted yoghourt*, cooled with snow, and a quantity of little unripe plums cut up into it, so excruciatingly sour as to draw tears from the eyes. I did not repeat the application to my familiar Carduchian. The council, which was numerously attended, were served, like us, on oblong tables at the bottom of the hall; and they vigorously applied themselves to do honour to the feast, all their beards moving in cadence—"Oh 'tis merry in the hall when beards wag all!" This verse occurred to me when I cast my eyes down on the right and on the left, and it almost discomposed my gravity. I observe the Koords do not dispatch their dinner as quickly as the Turks, but eat leisurely, and chat over their food, the whole dinner being set down at once before them. The Pasha, before breakfast, said something gratifying to Veled Bey, one of the Jaf chiefs, who was present. Veled Bey, who was talking at the time, got up and rolled or shouldered, for he was a ponderous though handsome-looking man, very leisurely along the hall, continuing what he was saying all the time. When he came to the Pasha, the latter held out the palm of his hand to him, which he kissed slightly, and then retired to his place as deliberately and clumsily as he had quitted it. The members of the council smoked, and seemed to make themselves quite easy, speaking whenever anything occurred to them. In Bagdad the Musahibjees, or councillors, never venture to look to the right or the left in the presence of the Pasha; and they keep cringing and bowing at every word of their master, and never speak except when he desires them.

* A preparation of sour clotted cream or milk.

In the evening I talked with Mahmood Masraf on the different breeds of horses. Arab horses do not breed well in Koordistan; though the sire and dam be true desert nedjdis, the colts never turn out anything but very common horses. The Jaf tribe possesses a breed of small stout horses, much celebrated for their strength and activity.

May 22.—I went again to the club in the Meidan, and found the usual party assembled. Mahmood Masraf recollects well the foundation of the town of Sulimania, about thirty-two years ago. The then governor of southern Koordistan, Ibrahim Pasha, the father of Koord Suliman Pasha, and a relation of the present governor of Sulimania, resolved on removing the capital from Karatcholan, on the other side of the Azmir hills, to this place; both from a wish of signalizing himself and for the convenience of hunting, of which he was passionately fond, and for which amusement the situation of Karatcholan was singularly ill calculated, being in a very narrow, rocky valley. He called his new town Sulimania, in compliment to the then Pasha of Bagdad, Suliman Pasha, the father of the late unfortunate Saed Pasha. There was an ancient mount* here, which they pared

* There was a village round this old mount. The village was called Mellikindi, quasi Mellik Hindi, or the village of the Indian king. The Pasha told me, that in cutting away the mount away to suit the foundations of the palace, which was built in the time of Abdurrahman Pasha. Some coins were then found.

Sulimania is in the district of Sertchinar. By the best information I can obtain, it at present contains 2000 houses of Mahometans, 130 houses of Jews, nine houses of Chaldean Christians, who have a wretched small church, five houses of Armenians, who have no priest or church; six caravanserais; five baths, but only one good one; five mosques, of which one is good.

May 23.—The Pasha had made up a party this evening for firing at a mark; but a very high wind coming on, we were obliged to give it up: so I went to pass the afternoon with Abdulla Pasha, where the club came to meet me. Kai Khosroo Bey, who seems by the way to have taken a great fancy to me, though we do not understand a word of each other's language, came rolling in as usual. After a dead silence, he on a sudden gobbled out something which I did not perceive to be addressed to me; but the gobbling noise being repeated, I turned round and observed him to be staring point blank at me; and then the Masraf, who could hardly help smiling, large urns, with fragment of bones in them, were discovered; also an inscription, which was thrown away, as nobody could read it. He also said that, not long ago, he himself, in digging down in the palace for some repairs, found fragments of urns and bones at a great depth.

said to me in Turkish, "The Bey means that he wishes heartily to see you at the Tribe (six days off in the high border-mountains), and that he would give you a most sincere welcome." In effect I believe he would, and I have half a notion of accepting his invitation.

May 24.—At three o'clock I went with the Pasha to fire at a mark. The exercising ground is about a mile and a half from the town, on the Azmir road, near the foot of the hills. The Pasha, Abdulla Pasha, and myself sat together under a shemsia, and looked on. The best marksman was Osman Bey, and he certainly was an admirable shot with a heavy rifle. Most of the other marksmen also fired very well.

May 25.—I had the Pashas with me in the morning for more than an hour, but I was not well enough to note the conversation, which, indeed, was not interesting. In the afternoon I went to see Osman Bey, who was delighted that I had spoken so highly of his performance yesterday. He is very desirous I should teach him the broad sword, and to shoot at a mark with a pistol, of which the Orientals have no notion.

May 26.—I was much indisposed and could not see any one.

May 27.—I went to see Omar Khaznadar, a gentleman who lives close to us. He is a pleasant, good-natured man. In speaking of the curiosities of Koordistan, he mentioned the Takht i Suliman, which is a plateau, and said to be the highest part of the Sinna mountains. In this mountain he described some curious excavations, or a subterranean city, as they call it ; but he and several other persons present mentioned still more considerable excavations at a place called Dillo, in the hill between Karadagh and Ibrahim Khangee. The entrance is very small, but the passages are very spacious, and branch off in many directions, so as to render it extremely dangerous to proceed without great precautions, as many persons have been lost in their intricacies. The passages, at least some of them, are described as being bordered by cells, which they call shops and houses. About fifty persons were lately in this cavern, and wandered about for several hours, expending a jar of naphtha oil in light ; but in no part of their ramble did they reach any termination of the excavations. The Koords say this was a city of Jian ben Jian, the Prince of the Genii*. Omar Aga and I have formed

* Jian ben Jian, or the Prince of the Genii, is supposed by the Mahometans to have been sovereign of the world before the creation of man, and to have built the pyramids of Egypt. He reigned over a race which, according to the Koran, was created out of fire, and therefore refused to submit to man who was only created out of earth.

The Mahometans believe that this race filled and governed the world for 2000 years before the creation of Adam, and that, upon refusing obedience to him, they were driven into a distant and a plan to go and explore it; and we are to take necessaries for continuing four or five days there if needful. This mountain of Dillo contains sulphur, naphtha, alum, salt, and a fountain of acid water of a yellow colour.

I spent the evening with Osman Bey, who had prepared a small musical party to entertain me. The performers were but indifferent artists, being second-rate Bagdad singers; but I had much agreeable conversation with the Bey.

One of the Jaf chiefs being there, gave me occasion to make some inquiries respecting the government and constitution of the tribe. I am told that Kai Khosroo Bey, who is the chief of all the Jaf nation, may kill or punish at pleasure; that he has no council, nor the least necessity for consulting with any of the elders of the tribe*. If the Pasha requires a sum of money or a levy of troops from him, he summons the chiefs of the Tirehs, or branches, and divides the burden equally among them, while they do the same with the principal people of their own Tirehs. It was not until the remote corner of the earth, called the mountains of Kaf, and confined there as a punishment for their rebellion.—See Preliminary Discourse to Sale's Koran, page 95; D'Herbelot, Bibliothèque Orientale, pp. 396, 820, &c.

* I have since been informed on, I believe, better authority, that the chief of the Jafs can neither kill nor mutilate, without consulting with the elders of the tribe.

reign of Abdurrahman Pasha that the Jafs were brought to bear a part in the affairs of Koordistan.

May 28.—Early in the morning I went to the Zor Khana, or gymnasium, belonging to Omar Aga. With respect to the different kinds of exercises performed there, I have nothing to add to Niebuhr's description of the Zor Khana, at Shirauz, which is excellent*. In the afternoon I had Osman Bey with me, together with Kai Khosroo Bey and the Masraf. The latter told me of a forced march he made from Bagdad to Sulimania, in two days and nights, arriving the third day, during the season of the saum wind. The party consisted of 1300 horse, out of which about 200 men and horses died from heat and fatigue. This happened after Sheikh Twiney, the Montefik Arab's affair, when Suliman Pasha of Bagdad deposed Osman Pasha of Sulimania, and invested Ibrahim Pasha in his room. Osman Pasha's army refused to serve Ibrahim Pasha, and made this forced march to escape into Koordistan to Abdurrahman Pasha. It was certainly a prodigious exertion.

May 29.—I met my friends as usual in the Meidan. The night was most disagreeable. The wind, which had been south all day, at sunset suddenly came round to N.E., and soon began to blow with violence, bringing with it clouds of dust, and immense quantities of sand-flies, which I should not have expected to find here. These put sleep out of the question for the whole night. The wind was also extremely hot and relaxing. This is the so much dreaded Sherki, which seems to blow from any quarter, from E. to N.E. It resembles the Italian sirocco *, and is greatly feared by the people of Sulimania for its violence and relaxing qualities. One thing is extremely curious, and to me as yet quite unaccountable, though asserted by every one in the country,—that the influence of this wind is not felt more than two hours off in any direction.

* Voyage en Arabic, tom. ii. p. 141.

May 30.—I sat for an hour with the Pasha this morning. He pressed me to give him my word that I would visit Sulimania every year, in which case he would build a comfortable house for me. His recreant brother, Hassan Bey, accompanied by Rustam Effendi, the ex-Defterdar † of Bagdad, who is the bearer of a khilaut ‡ for Mahmood Pasha, is expected here the day after to-morrow, and an istakbol § is preparing for the khilaut.

In the evening I dined with Osman Bey. All the principal persons in the town, amounting to fourteen, were invited to meet me, and the dinner was

* Pronounced scirocco, and no doubt the same word as sherki, i. e. easterly. The Koords call it Baya Rish, or black wind.

† Lord Treasurer.

‡ A dress of honour.

§ A public entry.

really a most excellent one. It was served in the Persian style like that of the Pasha, in oblong trays called khuantchees, on which the dishes were arranged. We dined out on a grass-plot before the house. The Bey and I sat at one khuantchee at the top of the party; the others were arranged at khuantchees down each side. Kai Khosroo Bey rolled in after the dinner had commenced, and gobbling out an excuse in a few unintelligible words, immediately placed himself at the head of one of the side-tables, and addressed himself to the viands with great diligence. The Koords, like the Persians, eat slowly, and talk between whiles, their dinner lasting as long as ours. They have a great objection to the ravenous mode of feeding practised by the Turks, among whom the dishes are put down separately on the table, and taken off after a few mouthfuls have been snatched by the guests. This seems to be the old Tartar fashion; while the Persians appear always to have been deliberate at their meals*. After dinner most of the guests went to the Pasha's Divan, while a few, invited by the Bey, stayed to a musical party. The performers were those of the other night, and

* I now see clearly the meaning of the passage in Hafiz, which in English literally is, "These wanton damsels have snatched away quiet from my heart, as Turks do a tray of plunder;" about which sundry far-fetched explanations have been given. So little observing are the Orientals, that it is very likely the allusion contained in this passage, though concerning their own customs, never struck them.

were very indifferent. I had much curious conversation with the Bey about the political state of his country. He did not disguise his sentiments from me. He hates the 'Turks bitterly. "They are made up of treachery and insolence," said he. "No one knows how to treat the 'Turks," continued he, "as well as I do. It is a maxim with me to keep them down, and never to trust them. A Turk never behaves well but when he is kept in terror, and treated with incivility." Though I do not go the length he does, I feel that there is some justice in what he says. He made up a wrestling match for to-morrow afternoon, and wished it to be at my house, as he was afraid that it would be presuming to expect I should come twice running to him. But my house has no space for such exhibitions, and I desired him in our future intercourse to waive all ceremony.

I had an opportunity to-day of observing, what had often struck me before, that the Oriental prayers are a matter of mere routine. When the company this evening rose to pray at the sunset Azan or prayer, the Bey muttered religious ejaculations for several minutes before he began with prodigious apparent fervour; but in the interval of the rikials or prostrations, overhearing some trivial remark which I made to a person who had spoken to me, (also in the interval of his devotions,) he turned about to answer me; and then gave directions to his people about laying out the dinner, which they were in the act of bringing in. He then went on again with another rikiah. I have often observed this indifference and indecorum in the Mahometans; chatting, scolding, and looking about them while yet on their knees in the attitude of devotion. The fact is, that these prayers are so formal, so unvarying, so often and so publicly repeated, that they become a mere pantomime. When the Bey sat down again on the sofa, while the servants were arranging the dishes, he recited the names of God on his tespih or beads, frequently interrupting himself to make some indifferent observation.

May 31.—Passed the morning with Abdulla Pasha, and in the afternoon went to the wrestling-match. The court was full of people, and the wall was covered with spectators, every one being admitted. There were some matches made in a peasant-like style with very little science; but the Koords were delighted, and none more so than Osman Bey himself. Two of the wrestlers belonged to Azeez Aga, the Masraf's eldest son, a fine young man, who has taken mightily to me. I backed his men against those of the Bey; but I was not lucky, as they were both thrown. The Koords are the most determined sportsmen I ever knew; great and small, young and old,—it is the favourite passion of the nation. The Bey has made up a party to come to my house, on purpose to show off his skill at the sword.

On my return home, I sent him a present of my fine pistols, to his infinite delight, but I am told he never keeps his presents a month ; and whoever asks for anything he has is sure to get it from him. I made him promise to keep my pistols as a remembrance.

June 1.—This morning Rustum Effendi, from Bagdad, made his public entry into the town, accompanied by Hassan Bey. The Pasha went out about a mile to meet him, as the Effendi is the bearer of the Pelisse of Investiture from the Pasha of Bagdad. It appears that the Pasha of Bagdad, who seduced Hassan Bey from his allegiance, has actually sold him back again, and given him up unconditionally to his offended brother. It is fortunate for Hassan Bey that his brother is neither a Turk nor a Persian. He was brought as a prisoner, by a party of a hundred Georgians, who guarded him night and day until he reached Sulimania. The young man appeared very downcast ; indeed he makes but a foolish sort of a figure. However, the dastardly way in which he has been abandoned by the Turks operates rather in his favour. All the people of the town express openly their contempt for the Pasha of Bagdad for giving him up.

In the afternoon, at the Meidan, I met Suliman Bey, the Pasha's youngest brother. He, Osman Bey, and the Pasha, are by the same mother, a lady of the Bebbek family, and sister to Khaled Pasha. Hassan Bey is by the sister of Kai Khosroo Bey, of the Jaf tribe.

Suliman Bey is thirty years of age, but appears older than he really is. He is taller than his brothers; of a mild, serious, and agreeable countenance, and gentle, unaffected manners.

Bauker Khan was likewise of the party at the Meidan, and seemingly in high spirits, notwithstanding the events of the day, and the entire revolution in favour of the Turkish interests. There is still, however, a mystery in his stay here, which I cannot entirely penetrate. We talked of the Bakhtyarees, who are unquestionably Koords, as I had always supposed. Many people present had conversed with them. Bauker Khan, himself a Koord, has often been among them. He says their language is a dialect of the Loristan Koordish, and that he can understand them when they speak. All the accounts I have ever had agree with this.

June 2.—The barley-crops are now getting in. The harvest has been a little retarded by the late rains. Cucumbers have just made their appearance, but as yet they are scarce and dear. Some mulberries are ripe. Wheat is not ready to be cut down until the middle or latter end of June.

On going to-day to pay my compliments to the Pasha on his investiture, I found him sitting on a grass-plat on one side of the palace, in a very pleasant situation. He had got up some wrestling-matches to entertain me, for he has no taste himself for anything of the kind.

Hassan Bey, the runaway brother, was there. I like his appearance less than that of his brothers. He was muttering prayers to himself all the time, and seemed quite recovered from his embarrassment. His late history has been simply this :—He was the favourite brother of Mahmood Pasha ; but last year Daoud, Pasha of Bagdad, began a secret correspondence with him, to endeavour to entice him from, and set him up, against his brother, in which at last he was successful. Hassan Bey ran away to Bagdad, where he was received with singular honour, and shortly afterwards created Pasha of Keuy Sanjiak ; from which post, however, he was recalled in a few weeks, the Pasha of Bagdad finding it to be impossible to make head against Mahmood Pasha, assisted by the Persians. At last, finding Hassan Bey of no further use to him, he closed with the first advantageous offer made by Mahmood Pasha, and gave up Hassan Bey to his justly offended brother, without caring what became of him. As throwing light on the above transaction, I may here add, that about a twelvemonth ago an officer of Mahmood Pasha's was treating with Daoud Pasha about some affair, when the Pasha, after making some difficulties, at last seemingly consented to the wishes of the Koordish chief, and said to his emissary, “ I swear by God, and by the head of my son Yusuf, that I consider Mahmood Pasha as my son equally with Yusuf ; that I love him as a father, and have his interests nearest my heart." He had already decided the affair against Mahmood Pasha, and was at that very moment engaged in the secret correspondence with Hassan Bey, which had for its object to betray and destroy the very man whom "he considered as his son equal with Yusuf." This anecdote is unquestionable, and is one of many, of a similar character, which I could relate of Daoud Pasha, and almost every other Turkish chief whom I have known. Osman Bey, and several other dashing young Koords, have been for the last two days practising the sword, with an intention of showing off before me to-morrow. The exhibition was to have taken place this evening, but was deferred on account of my visit to the Pasha.

June 3.—I went in the morning to welcome Rustum Effendi to Sulimania, and in the afternoon our party of swordsmen met at my house. A roll of felt, forty folds thick, was dipped in water, and suspended by a string. Osman Bey took the first cut, and at an easy blow severed the roll in two. Suliman Bey, who by the bye is a pleasing young man, followed, and did the same. Azeez Aga came next, and was equally successful. Another felt was suspended, but Osman Bey failed; he, however, cut through to within two or three folds. Azeez Aga and Suliman Bey also failed. Osman Bey then took another cut; but by this time he was nervous, and performed worse than before. Azeez Aga then took one of the sections of the felt, extending and placing it on the ground, and cut it through clean at a blow. His brother Abdurrahman did the same. This I thought a greater feat than cutting through the suspended felt. The Bey asked me if this was not better than our system. I told him it would do very well, provided the adversary stood to be cut at like the roll of felt ; but I showed him how, if he missed his cut, he was entirely at the mercy of an opponent, who knew the use of his weapon, according to our method. He seemed convinced at last that there was some truth in what I said ; but Azeez Aga would not allow it.

June 8.—Mr. Bell arrived* on the 4th, since when I have been visiting and amusing myself among my Koordish friends ; but I recollect nothing worth recording, and the relaxing effect of the north-east wind has rendered me averse to writing.

This afternoon I had some discourse with Omar Aga and Mahmood Aga about the agriculture of Koordistan. The usual increase of grain is about five to ten, to one of seed ; fifteen is an extraordinarily good crop. Last year the crops of grain were bad, and yielded only two. Wheat and barley are sown alternately in the same ground. They depend on the rain^{*}; which mode of agriculture is called dem. There is a kind of corn called bahara, which is sown in the spring, and requires artificial irrigation. In the plains the land is not allowed to lie fallow; but it is relieved by alternating the crops of wheat and barley. In the hilly country the land must rest every other year. Cotton must never be sown twice running in the same ground; some crops of tobacco generally intervene.

* Mr. Bell had been appointed by the government of Bombay surgeon and assistant to the Bagdad residency ; and being in very delicate health, he joined Mr. Rich in Koordistan for the benefit of the mountain-air. His very amiable disposition, his lively and unaffected manners, his love of travelling, and thirst after information, made him a most welcome and agreeable addition to Mr. Rich's family ; to whom his medical skill and gentle kindness were afterwards of the very greatest benefit.—Ed.

The cotton is all of the annual kind, and generally requires watering, though in the hilly grounds some is grown by the means of rain. Manure is applied only to vines and tobacco. Rice should not be sown for several years running in the same ground, which, however, may be employed for other grain. The rice is chiefly grown in the district of Shelh-rizoor. No hemp or flax is grown in Koordistan. Omar Aga told me that this year he has thrown into the ground a small quantity of flax seed, which he procured from a Hadgee who had brought it from Egypt. Much Indian corn, millet, lentiles, gram, and one or two other species of pulse, are grown. The plough is drawn by two bullocks.

No trees of the orange or lemon genus will flourish in Koordistan. The summer heat is indeed more than adequate; but the winter is too severe for them.

^{*} It must be remembered, that much of the cultivation in the East is watered by the help of artificial means, such as, for instance, aqueducts and canals.

The Pasha lately procured some Seville oranges and sweet lime-plants from Bagdad, for his new garden ; but the first winter killed them. The ricinus, or castor-oil plant, is cultivated all over Koordistan ; sometimes in separate fields, sometimes mixed with cotton.

June 10.—I have been much indisposed the last two days, principally owing I believe to the heat ; as we are living in a tent, until our Koordish summer residence, called a tchardak, is ready to receive us. The heat of the sun strikes with great force through the canvass of the tent, in which the thermometer stands at 103° and 104° ; while in a tchardak it does not rise above 92° .

The Pasha to-day proposed a review, as most of the horses are now come back from grass ; but, as it was to take place at the hottest time of the day, I begged to be excused, and the review was put off. I had no notion it had been exclusively intended for my amusement, otherwise I would have made an effort to go. As soon as the Pasha was informed I was unwell, he came immediately to visit me, without previously sending word, and with such haste, that I had not time to turn out the guard before he was at the door. He sat with me an hour and a half. He told me the Pasha of Bagdad had recommended him to build a fort, and promised to furnish it with ordnance and stores. He therefore begged I would ride out and look for a convenient spot in the neighbourhood, and assist them by tracing it out, which I promised him to do when I was well enough. He recurred to the European astronomy, a subject which he had before touched upon in several conversations. He particularly inquired concerning the mountains in the moon; and said he had been always taught in his religion, that the moon was a piece of iron, polished by the Almighty, in order to reflect on the earth the rays of the sun. He has caused his munnejjim bashi, or chief astronomer, to draw me up a map of the world according to the Oriental system, which he gave me; and it is really very well done in its way.

The Pasha invited me to come to-morrow to the palace, to be present at an exhibition of sword cutting, as Osman Bey has been preparing himself ever since the last trial. He has also requested I would let him see the sepoy's exercise.

June 11.—We have to-day got into our tehardak. It is about thirty feet long by fifteen broad, and the architecture is primitive enough. Three ranges of four posts are driven into the ground. They are forked on the top, and are about seven feet high. These are connected together at the top by long spars, and over them rafters are laid, on which is heaped an accumulation of oak boughs and leaves to the thickness of two or three feet, having a few bricks thrown loosely on the top to keep them steady. After the superstructure is raised, they lay the floor: this is first done with common mud, which when dry is again covered with a plaster of clay mixed with chopped straw: a ledge of about six inches high runs round the whole. This, with some variety in the size, is the ordinary accommodation of the Koords during the hot months. They spread their beds on the top at night, and screen themselves from public view by an open reed mat called a tehigh, which allows the air to pass. The largest and handsomest tehardaks have generally a haouz, or tank of water, in the centre, sometimes with a little jet d'eau, which much refreshes the air.

The display of swordmanship this evening at the Pasha's went off but poorly. The Pasha and I had another astronomical conversation. His astronomer has reported me to be little less than a Maskelyne or a Herschel. The fast of Ramazan, it had been supposed, would have commenced on the thirteenth; but I assured the Pasha that the moon had actually changed, and informed him of the hour and minute. After I left him he ordered the fast to be proclaimed for to-morrow. -

June 15.—The Ramazan having begun, I sit out from nine until about midnight to receive visitors, as the Mahometans, during this fast, turn night into day, sleeping, and spending the hours of fasting in retirement and reading the Koran, and devoting the night to eating and receiving company.

Last night we were entertained by the performance of two Koordish peasants on the bilwar, or Koordish flute, made of a reed. They played in unison. The tones were soft and agreeable: the airs melancholy, and rather monotonous. The best was a song called "Leili jan," and another beginning "Az de Naleem*."

A Koordish servant of my mehmandar's was desired to sing. He struck up a dismal ditty, consisting of a great number of verses, each of two parts or strains, which were regularly connected together by a sob or, as he gave it, a hiccup. The song itself seemed intended to imitate wailing.

The Koordish shepherd's flute is called shemshal, and is made of wood turned. Its tones are loud, but not disagreeable, especially when echoed among the mountains. They have particular calls for gathering together their sheep, which these animals are said to comprehend perfectly. This flute requires a great deal of breath; and in playing on it they make a noise by forcing their breath with a kind of humming.

A Gooran, from Sinna, next gave us a Sinna air, which was a sad screaming performance, and the Sulimania people present declared that they understood it only imperfectly.

* Besides these we were often favoured with other popular Koordish airs, such as "Men Kuzha benaz;" "Mil ki Jan;" "Azcezee."

CHAPTER V.

Brave Russian Soldier—Cruelty of the Prince of Kermanshah—Great Mahometan Saint—Natural Productions of Koordistan—Piety of Mahmood Pasha—Anecdote—Abdullah Pasha arrested—The Bairam—Koordish Tribes—Anecdote—The Bulbassi Tribes—The reigning Families in Koordistan—Arrival of Delli Samaan with Antiques.

June 24 —MANY visits have passed between me and the Pasha, Osman Bey, and my usual round of friends (always at night), in the interval since the date of my last journal; but I have not been well, and consequently have avoided writing; neither do I recollect much worth recording. The conversation of the Pasha has been chiefly of a religious character since the commencement of the Ramazan. He displays an extraordinary degree of piety and faith in his way, without any of the intolerance or arrogance which a Turk of much less devotion invariably assumes. “The bravest man I ever knew,” said the Pasha, “was a poor Russian soldier, whom I saw when I accompanied the Prince Mahomed Ali Mirza in his inroad into Georgia. The man was carrying dispatches, and was taken prisoner by the Persians, and brought before the Prince, who interrogated him as to the purport of his business. ‘What I am going about,’ said the man, ‘is contained in my dispatches; they are in Russian; read them if you can.' The Prince, finding nothing was to be got out of him, asked him to become a Mussulman. The man refused; on which the Prince threatened him with the most cruel torments, but the man's resolution was not to be shaken. The Prince therefore ordered a grave to be dug; all the while the soldier laughed and chatted with those around him with the utmost unconcern. When the grave was ready, the Prince once more asked him if he would become a Mussulman; and upon his refusal, ordered him to be buried alive, which was instantly done, though I did all I could to prevent so barbarous an act. It was a pity to see so fine and brave a fellow sacrificed for religion. What business had the Prince with his faith?"

I could not help thinking, on hearing this atrocious anecdote, that if I commanded a Russian army, and ever took the Prince prisoner, I would infallibly hang his highness on the first tree we came to.

I spent yesterday evening again with the Pasha, who conversed on various subjects. He told me that the natives of Koordistan are subject to a fever which they call gheranitee, that is, heaviness. It continues for three or four days, and is carried off by a profuse perspiration, which leaves the patient in a very weak state. This generally prevails in the spring, but is seldom fatal.

There is a great Mahometan saint living in Sulmania. His name is Sheikh Khaled; but the Koords think it profanation to call him by any other name than Hazret i Merlana, or the holy beloved one; and talk of his sayings as being Hudeez, or inspired. He is of the Jaf tribe, and is a dervish of the Nakshibendi order, which he embraced at Delhi, under the guidance of the celebrated Soofee Sultan Abdulla. He has 12,000 disciples in various parts of Turkey and Arabia. All the Koords call him an evlia or saint; and a great many of them almost put him on a footing with their Prophet. Osman Bey, who with the Pasha and almost all the principal Koords are his mureeds or disciples, told me that he was at least equal to the famous Mussulman saint, Sheikh Abdul Kader*.

* In a journal of Mr. Rich's, of an older date, at Bagdad, is the following account of another of this singular body of men, the Mahometan dervishes:—"To day (January 7, 1817) a mureed (disciple) of Sultan Hassan, a celebrated dervish, came to see me. We talked about his master, whom he praised extravagantly. 'The Sultan, sir,' said he, meaning the dervish, 'understands everything by miracle. If you spoke to him in your own language he would understand you, though he never learnt it; and he knows every science without having read: nay, he knows even what passes in your mind; and when you have the intention of consulting him, he will answer you without your having spoken a word. He knows that we are now talking about him, and he will appear to people in dreams, or even in actual presence, though they be in India or Persia.' The same person solemnly assured me to-day (January 17) that he had seen and conversed with Khidder Elias (the Prophet Elijah), whom the Mahometans believe to be still alive, and walking the earth; sometimes revealing himself to dervishes, of whom he is the peculiar patron and protector. My friend assured me that Khidder Elias accompanied him for two days to show him the road."

June 25.—I had much conversation last night with Omar Aga relative to the natural productions of Koordistan.

Kerkook is the mart to which all the productions of this part of Koordistan are carried, not by the Koords themselves, but by the natives of Kerkook, who come here for the purpose, and make advances of money to the cultivators for their rice, honey, &c. A great quantity of honey of the finest quality is produced in Koordistan; the bees are kept in hives of mud.

Gall-nuts are produced in great abundance, especially in the dwarf oak forest of Karadagh. They are exported to Kerkook, and thence to Mousul.

The plant which produces the gum arabic grows wild in the mountains. It has a purple flower, and is called gheyun.

Manna* is found on the dwarf oak, though several other plants are said to produce it, but not so abundantly, or of such good quality. It is collected by gathering the leaves of the tree†, letting them dry, and then gently threshing them on a cloth. It is thus brought to market in lumps, mixed with an immense quantity of fragments of leaves, from which it is afterwards cleared by boiling. There is another kind of manna found on rocks and stones, which is quite pure, of a white colour, and it is much more esteemed than the tree manna. The manna season begins in the latter end of June, at which period, when a night is more than usually cool, the Koords say it rains manna, and maintain that the greatest quantity is always found in the morning after such a night.

* Called in Turkish, kudret halvassi, or the divine sweetmeat; in Arabic, musee; in Persian, ghezungabeen; in Koordish, ghezo.

† “The manna on each leaf did pearled lie.”

Fairfax's Tasso.

Omfar Aga likewise told me the names of several plants and animals in Koordish, which I here insert, together with other Koordish words of which I have learnt the meaning. Many are evidently Persian.

Haws, the berries of the hawthorn, are called gweizh or gowheizh; milk-wort, khuzhilk; briar-rose, shilan; trefoil, separeh; hollyhock, herro; sunflower, gul ruzhian perest; the common anemone, deazilk; the thistle, kiwar*; convolvulus major, lulan; a poplar, ispindar; weeping-willow, shorabi; the turpentine-tree, dariben: this tree grows in the mountains; the turpentine is procured from it by wounding the tree in the spring, and placing earthen vessels to receive the juice, which is of a very fine quality. The red-breast is called fendeguleh; a tortoise, kessal; the trout, which is common in many of the mountain-streams, is called kashina; the quail, karawara; a species of partridge smaller than the red-legged kind, and of a bluish or slaty grey, are called seska; grapes, træ; a valley, doli; a lady, yaya; the ladies of the reigning family call themselves khanum; but all the other Koordish ladies are called yaya, which seems to be the original Koordish term for lady. The men have preserved no original titles; they are all beys, khans or agas.

* The Koords give these to their horses, well beaten up and wetted, when they cannot procure barley; and they say it nourishes the horses very well.

July 1.—The Pasha was with me this evening. He is certainly, without exception, the most unaffected and practically pious Mahometan I ever knew. He told me an anecdote to-night, not in praise of himself, but simply as narrating a fact, illustrative of the advantage of placing our confidence in God, which is highly characteristic. I will endeavour to give it as nearly as possible in his own words. It would lose much were it told in any other than his own simple and scriptural idiom.

“During the time I was a hostage at Kermanshah for the fidelity of my late father, he was obliged by circumstances to adopt the Turkish interests. My life was consequently forfeited; and the Shahzadeh sent for me to put me to death. It was night. I was brought before him with my arms tied behind my back. The Prince was sitting in his hall, and lighted candles were in the middle of it, and the executioner stood by ready to perform his office on me. Many a man who would face death in the field of honour would shrink at being brought up, with his hands bound, before the executioner. It was a fearful sight (may God never show it to you!); and I own, my courage forsook me. In my agony, however, I had presence of mind left to call on the name of the Lord ; and, praised be his name, it was instantly revealed to me. I felt it strike on my heart, as if the following words had been impressed on it : “ Am I not He who brought thee out of thy mother’s womb, and protected thee through all dangers to the present hour ? Might I not have destroyed thee at any moment ? therefore why fearest thou now ? Can this man do aught against thee, except by my will ? ” At that instant I felt comfort, my heart gained strength, and I stood before the prince fearless and undaunted. Blessed be God, instead of causing me to be put to death, as had been his firm resolve when he sent for me, the Prince only remanded me back to prison, and nothing more was done to me.”

Last night while I was sitting in a large company at Omar Khaznadar’s, the evening having previously been calm and warm, and we were all busily employed in talking, just as the moon rose about ten, an intolerably hot puff of wind came from the north-east. All were immediately silent, as if they had suddenly felt an earthquake, and then exclaimed, in a dismal tone, “ The sherki is come * ! ” This was indeed the so much dreaded sherki, and it has continued blowing ever since with great violence from the east and north-east, the wind being heated like our Bagdad saum, but I think softer and more relaxing. This wind is the terror of these parts, and without it the climate of Sulimania would be very agreeable.

* As soon as this wind came on, the thermometer rose 10 degrees, from 80° to 90°.

The town of Sulimania is situated in a hollow, about two miles from the foot of the east range of hills, the débris of which slope down to it; and among these in a sort of ravine it is built. The neighbouring hills are steep and bare; in height they may be about 300 yards. They serve as a reflector to the rays of the sun, which strikes upon them from about seven in the morning until sunset all the summer; and the wind rushing down the face of these hills carries its heat thus acquired to the town when it blows from the east and north-east. About east of the town the hills recede a little, and the south-east wind is not so bad, consequently, as the north-east, which is the worst point of all. The sherki has the same heated, relaxing quality, all along this line of hills; but westward it reaches no farther than the Tanjeroo river, and as soon as you cross the ridge of the hills its effects cease altogether. The same phenomenon prevails at Keuy Sanjiak, which is situated in a narrow valley of the same aspect as this; but the hills are higher, and the sherki is stronger and hotter. It seldom blows due north here, and all the west points are agreeable.

I must now mention a curious fact, which I could not set down until I had ascertained it by a long course of observations. At dawn, it is generally quite calm. As the sun rises above the hills, a slight air comes on from the point of sunrise. This follows the sun to the meridian, at noon there being generally a breeze, or at least a strong puff or two from the south. When the sun passes the meridian, the wind comes round to the west. The mornings are generally disagreeable, and the afternoons extremely pleasant, with a fine westerly breeze. I have observed this always to be the case when the sherki did not prevail. The hottest time of the day is from noon until 3 P.M.

July 6.—Last night I was with Osman Bey. He appeared absent and much out of spirits, though he made a strong effort to talk and amuse me. I observed the same thing of the Pasha, with whom I passed the preceding evening. Soon after I left Osman Bey, which was about eleven at night, Abdullah Pasha was arrested, and confined in a room separated off from the haram of the palace. At the same moment, a detachment under the command of Suliman Bey marched off to seize the brothers of Abdullah Pasha, who reside in their government, in a district west of Sulimania. The motive of this act is stated to be as follows:—

When Mahmood Pasha finally determined on submitting to the Turks a short time ago, he went to Sheikh Khaled, the great living saint of Sulimania, accompanied by his uncle, Abdullah Pasha, and his two brothers, Osman and Suliman. These three swore allegiance to Mahmood Pasha; and, as they foresaw that the Prince of Kermanshah was likely to attempt gaining over one of them, to set him up against the Pasha and the Turkish interest, they took an oath on the sword and the Koran and by their divorce*, that whatever letters might come to either of them from Persia or Turkey, they should open them at Sheikh Khaled's house, and in presence of the whole party who then made the agreement. The first person to be tried was Osman Bey, who shortly after received a letter from the Shahzadeh, inviting him to come to Kermanshah, and promising him the government of Sulimania. This letter Osman Bey immediately communicated to his brothers. Another letter of the same nature was received by Abdullah Pasha, who, contrary to their agreement, concealed it; and the fact was only made known to Mahmood Pasha by an express sent to him by the Pasha of Bagdad, who somehow or other had come to the knowledge of it, and who recommended Mahmood Pasha to secure his uncle. Mahmood Pasha would not believe it, and absolutely refused to take any steps against Abdullah Pasha; but at the same time he resolved to watch his motions more narrowly. At last he ascertained from Abdullah Pasha's own Khaznadar that he was preparing to escape to Kermanshab; and his immediate arrest was the consequence.

* That is, "May my wife be divorced if I break my word."

Abdullah Pasha had been given up, or rather betrayed, into the hands of Mahmood Pasha last year by the Pasha of Bagdad in the most disgraceful manner, and left entirely at the mercy of his nephew, who, had he been of a revengeful disposition, might have dispatched him secretly or openly without loss of time, or without any one calling him to an account; but no such thought entered the mind of Mahmood Pasha, who treated him kindly, and gave him some of the finest districts in Koordistan for his support, besides paying off debts he had contracted during his residence in Bagdad. Indeed he gave him more than was his share, considering the Pasha's own wants and the claims of the other members of his family. Such a return therefore as the present was the more melancholy.

July 10.—At night the Pasha sat with me some time. His spirits were much depressed. He spoke in the most affecting manner of the conduct of his uncle, and of his own feelings on discovering his treachery. The sentiments he expressed (and which were no doubt his real ones) exhibited a degree of feeling, devotion, and benevolence, which I never thought to have met with in the East, and which I fear are not often to be found in better countries. He talked much of his own affairs, and consulted me on several points.

A beacon has been lighted from the opposite hills, to announce that the new moon has been seen from thence ; so that to-morrow is the feast of the Bairam.

July 11.—I had a long conversation with my intelligent friend Omar Aga, about various points relating to the Koords and their country. I set them down at random.

The people of Khoshnav and Rewendiz are to the last degree savage and stupid. They have no sort of scruple about killing a man, but would not miss a prayer for the world, though they have been known to fight in the mosque. Many years ago there was a quarrel between two districts about a dog, in which seventy men were killed on the spot, of whom thirty fell in a mosque, after they had joined together in public worship. They still fight at intervals about this same quarrel ; and no encounter takes place without the slaughter of some men. There is a Khoshnav chief now alive, whose name I forget : a fly once settled on his eye, and teased him ; he drove it off ; the insect returned two or three times ; and at last the Koord getting into a fury, struck himself in the eye with his khanjar or dagger, blinded himself of one eye, and was very nearly killed.

In the tribes* which form the Bulbass nation, every man, even of the meanest rank, has a voice in public affairs. You may be settling business with Bulbass chiefs, and have come to an agreement with them, when on a sudden some common fellow will start up and say, "I do not agree to it !" and this is enough to spoil the whole affair in a moment. When Abdurrahman Pasha had finished a war in which he had been engaged with the Bulbassis, a treaty was concluded ; and it was agreed that Kako Hassan, or brother Hassan, the Bulbass chief, should visit Sulinia, Selim Bey, the Pasha's brother, remaining as hostage among the Bulbassis. When Kako Hassan was setting out, on a sudden a common fellow laid his hand on his dagger, and said very coolly, "If the Bebbehs get hold of Kako Hassan, they will certainly kill him, and then they will boast of having shed the blood of a Bulbass chief; it is better for me to kill him myself here." All attempts to make him hear reason were in vain. Selim Bey, therefore, mounted his horse, and resolved on returning to his own home, and having nothing to say to Kako Hassan. When he had rid a little way, the savage suddenly changed his mind, and hallooed after the Bey, desiring him to come back. "Take Kako Hassan," said he, "and go with him yourself; we don't want a hostage: if you are men, you will behave properly to him." All the Bulbassis agreed to this arrangement; and the Bey and Kako Hassan departed together*.

* The names of four of which are Rummook, Manzoor, Piran, and Mamash.

* Some further information concerning the Bulbassis, obtained from one of the tribe, is added from among Mr. Rich's loose papers.

The Bulbassis have among them a people of dependants or peasants, who have no voice in their affairs, and are considered as a very inferior caste. This people are found scattered all over Koordistan, and are of no tribe or clan. The tribesmen call them Kelowspee or White Caps, and also Gooran. This latter name, which is the proper denomination of the people of Sinna, is applied by the clansmen as

The Bulbassi nation is composed of the following tribes:—

1. Kabaiz, the reigning family, consisting of about two hundred persons; 2. Manzoor; 3. Mamash; 4. Piran; 5. Rummook; 6. Sinn and Taafah, who together make one tribe. The chiefs of tribes are called Muzzin. Each chief has a certain number of thieves, who rob for him; and his tribe makes him voluntary gifts of provisions. These are his only revenues. The price of blood among the Bulbassis is twenty-two oxen; but it may be made up in other effects, to which often a nominal value is attached, more than twice the real amount, when the affair is to be compounded amicably. Their only laws are the usages of the tribe, and these are administered by the chief, assisted by the council of elders. No crimes are punished with death but adultery, seduction, and such like. The Bulbassis will not bestow a girl in marriage on a person of another tribe or people. They have courtship among them; and carrying off a girl by the lover is common. When a chief dies, he is succeeded by the best or bravest of his family, with the common consent of his tribe. If his eldest son is incapable, the best of the brothers succeeds. When a chief is once nominated he cannot be deposed, and his authority is so well defined, that there are no instances of a chief ever having attempted to exceed them. In their own country the Bulbassis do not willingly acknowledge any superior, either Turkish or Persian; but when they descend into the regions of Karatchook (which they have not done for several years) they pay a tribute of sheep to the Bey. They are very fond of armour; and most of the principal people among them possess a complete suit of mail.

a term of reproach, and especially to timorous people. May not these be the aboriginal inhabitants of these countries, who had been conquered by the fierce tribes of the mountains? There are some wandering tribes under the government of Sinna, but all the settled population are Goorans*.

Among the reigning families in Koordistan, that of Bahdinan, whose capital is Amadia†, is the noblest, and is even looked upon as something saintly, deriving its origin from the caliphs; but from the ancient name of the family it dates possibly from a much more remote antiquity‡. No person dare use the same vessel or pipe as is used by the prince of this family; not even his own pipe-bearer for the purpose of lighting or trying it for his master. His person is so sacred, that, in the fiercest battle among tribes, their arms would fall from their hands if he approached them. Yet he has little or no power over the savage and warlike clans which compose his people; and he receives nothing from the revenues of his own estates. Should he want a sum of money for any extraordinary exigency, he mounts his mule and goes round to the chiefs of the different clans, becoming a musaffer, or guest, for a night with each of them, when, by the laws of hospitality, they cannot refuse his request; and in the morning when he departs, the chief with whom he has passed the night makes up a small sum as a voluntary offering to him.

* The Bulbassi Koords have a most curious way of curing wounds. They sew the wounded man in the skin of a bullock fresh stripped off the animal, leaving only his head out; and they leave him in it till the skin begins to putrefy. They say this never fails to cure the most desperate spear or sabre wounds.

† Amadia is called by the natives Ekbadan or Ekbeden. It is situated on a mountain, and contains about 1000 houses of Mahometans, 200 of Jews, 50 Nestorians, and a few Jacobite and Armenian families. See Appendix.

‡ I believe Zoroaster was from the country of Amadia.

He affects the state of the latter Abasside caliphs. He always sits alone. A servant brings in his dinner and then leaves him till he has finished it. After having eaten enough he smoothes the dish over, that no one may see what part he has eaten. He then calls a single attendant, who removes the dinner, brings him the basin and ewer to wash, supplies him with a pipe, and then leaves him alone again. The pasha is very well dressed, something in the fashion of Mousul, with a Cashmere shawl on his head, wound round a red cap which hangs down behind, and is called a fess. When he holds a divan, first the kiahya*, or prime minister, enters and salutes the pasha with an inclination of the body in the Persian manner, seating himself at a respectful distance. The chief of the Meroori tribe next follows, and takes his seat by the side of the kiahya; then the other resident chiefs of clans†, in the order of the rank of their clans. Pipes are then brought at the command of the pasha. Only one servant is allowed to enter, who distributes the pipes; and when the Pasha wishes the divan to break up, he orders coffee. The kahvajee, or coffee-maker, looks through the window, sees how many are present, fills as many cups with coffee, and arranges them on a tray which he brings in and hands in succession; after which they all go away, except it please the Pasha to order any particular person, with whom he may have business, to stop. It seems the grandeur of the Bahdinan Prince to render himself as inaccessible and invisible as possible. The Bebbeh chief, on the contrary, is expected to make himself as public as he can; and he has, indeed, seldom an hour to himself.

* The present kiahya is chief of the Nerooi tribe.

† The chiefs of certain clans are always resident in Amadia, or with the Pasha. Other clans may depute their chiefs with an occasional present, and that not unless they personally respect the Pasha.

Some of the Bahdinan princes, the father of the present one, for instance, have even covered their heads with a veil whenever they rode out, that no profane eye might see their countenance; and this we learn from Benjamin of Tudela was the practice of the later Caliphs of Bagdad. The uniform of the Pasha's own officers and servants is a black jacket made of abba stuff, manufactured at Mousul, with gold frogs. All wear the many-coloured striped trowsers which are the supreme bon ton in Amadia and Julamerk.

The Pasha, when he goes a hunting, changes his dress at a hunting-box of his, near Amadia, for one of a mountaineer of lower rank, in which he clambers the cliffs and lies in wait for the wild goat, observing never to shoot one younger than four years. Their age is easily recognized by the practised eye, even at a distance, by their horns. This and snaring, shooting, or hawking the red-legged partridge, is the only sport in the territory of Amadia, which is too mountainous to admit of exercise on horseback.

The air of Amadia is hot and unwholesome in the summer; at which period all the inhabitants retire to their yaylak or summer quarters, about two hours and a half from the town, in an elevated situation, where there is snow all the summer. Here the Pasha has a country-house, and the people make tchardaks. A strong guard is obliged to be kept, for fear of incursions from the Tiyari, an independent Christian tribe of the Chaldean nation*, who are much dreaded by all the Mahometans†.

Besides that of Bahdinan, there are other ancient, and once powerful families, who have ruled over different portions of Koordistan.

* These Christian tribes are geographically within the limits of the territory of Hakkari.

† Matran Hanna, the Syrian patriarch at Mousul, gave me the names of the following tribes of this people, whom he called Nestorian Christians:—The Tiyari, Tkoob, Jelooi, Liweeni, Berwaree, Nerooi. There are both Mahometans and Christians of the Nerooi and Berwaree tribe: the others are all Nestorians. There are four villages of Nestorians near Amadia called Gheranmoosi, who wear felt hats.

The family of Boattan, which commands the district of the same name, is a respectable family, but greatly reduced in consideration and influence. Their capital is Jezira, which is said to be now in a very ruinous condition. The district of Tor is between Jezira and Mardin, but independent of both.

The Soran family was very ancient, and once the most powerful of all the families of Koordistan, the whole of which country it possessed. Its capital was Hareer, where many of its monuments may still be seen, of a very superior style of architecture to any other in Koordistan of any age. This family is become extinct, and out of its ruins rose the Bebbeh family, with several others, who had been feudal chiefs under the Sorans. Of this number is the family of Keuy Sanjiak, which was a banner of the Sorans. It has since been expelled from Keuy Sanjiak, which is now governed by the Bebbehs.

The Bebbehs were feudal chiefs of Pizhder, under the Sorans, and their capital at that time was Darishmana, but which is now a miserable village of about eighteen houses. The Bebbeh family was formerly much more formidable than it is now, especially before the accession of old Suliman Pasha to the government of Bagdad, when the most part of the country, as far as Zengabad, Mendeli, and Bedran Jessan, was subject to the chief of the Bebbehs; Al-toon Kiupri and Arbil being likewise under his authority; and even Sinna, a province of Koordistan, which is generally under the dominion of Persia.

The family of Zehav is not much respected, nor was it ever of any great importance out of its own territory.

July 16.—After various consultations, we have at length selected the district of Kizzeljee as the best place for us to reside in during the great heats, which are already becoming extremely oppressive at Sulimania; and we have fixed upon to-morrow for our departure. All this day has been occupied in preparations, and in taking leave of the Pasha, Osman, and Suliman Beys, and our other friends. With the Pasha I had a very interesting conversation of more than two hours, principally on his own affairs. I most heartily wish him a happy issue out of his troubles, as he is a most amiable man. All my Sulimania friends are very loth to part with us, even for so short a time. They used all their endeavours to persuade me to remain at Sulimania. I never experienced such hospitality.

In the evening Delli Samaan arrived from Mousul with antiques*.

* Delli Samaan, or mad Simeon, was a Syrian Christian, who for many years had been employed by Mr. Rich to travel about and purchase for him coins and antiques.—Ed.

CHAPTER VI.

Departure from Sulimania for the Mountains—The Pass of Giozheh—Tents pitched at Gherradeh—Beauty of the situation—Noise and bustle of loading—High Mountains—Vineyards—Corn—Beautiful Country—Officer of the Chief of the District of Kizzeljee—Laughable Equivoque—Steep Ascent—Sons of Khaled Bey—Cantonment at Ahmed Kulwan—Reapers singing the Tale of Ferhad and Shireen—Locusts—Temperature of Springs—Green Frogs—Curious Game—Leave Ahmed Kulwan—Journey to Beestan—Artificial Mounts—Unhealthiness of Beestan—Our People all taken ill—Leave Beestan—Penjween—Jaf encampments—Moving parties—Lady and her servants—Jews.

July 17.—WE left Sulimania at twenty minutes before four o'clock in the morning, and took the Giozheh road, as being the easiest through which to pass the chain, or rather wall, of bare hills, which bounds Sulimania on the east. The Giozheh is the most southern of the passes that lead directly over this wall. Next to it, on the north, is the Azmir road, which goes to the city, or rather site of the old city of Karatcholan; and farther north is another called the Gavian road.

We reached the foot of the hills by a gentle rise all the way up from Sulimania, a little after four, and immediately began the ascent; first in the dry bed of a torrent, and then along the steep face of the hill, by a very narrow and precipitous path. About five we reached the summit, which in that part is a ledge of sandstone, joining two more lumpish and higher parts of the hill, and is only a few feet over. Here a fine view presented itself. Before us was the plain (which I call so to distinguish it from the hills, for, strictly speaking, there is not a level spot on it) of Surojik and Shehribazar, terminated on the right or south by a defile, and bounded on the east by high mountains, over which the sun was just rising. Towards the north, or Shehribazar side, the plain seems to narrow. The whole area is entirely cut up and broken into innumerable hills and valleys and ravines, formed by the bounding chain of hills, some of which are very considerable. The chain in which we were travelling was of sandstone, the layers sloping to the east. On its eastern face are many bushes of dwarf-oak; and the country beneath us appeared agreeably spotted with wood and cultivation. Our descent was north along the east face of the wall, but the road was not so abrupt as in ascending. We arrived at the bottom at six; the ascent having occupied thirty-five minutes, and the descent one hour and ten minutes. The remainder of our day's journey was N. 50 E. Soon after entering a narrow ravine, we passed first a small village, whose name I did not inquire, and then we came to the village of Benawillee, situated by a fine spring of water, in which we saw some considerable fish of the carp kind. They are quite tame, being unmolested by the peasantry. We threw some bread to them which they immediately snapped. Over the little pond which is formed by this spring grew a very fine telinar, or oriental plane; and some poplars and willows were scattered about. The place put me in mind of Kara Hassan; and the Koords are right, when they say that Sulimania is built in the very worst part of Koordistan. This village belongs to the district of Serotchik. All the land on the south is in that district; and all on the north-west is in the district of Shehribazar, of which the capital is, or rather was, Karatcholan. Having refreshed ourselves at the village of Benawillee with a cup of coffee, under the shade of the beautiful plane-tree, we mounted again at a quarter before seven, and proceeding at a pretty good pace over an undulating country, we descended a steep hill, and at half past seven arrived at our konak or resting-place, the village of Gherradeh, where we found our tents already pitched, as I had taken the precaution of sending them and the heavy baggage off last night. It had had a difficult passage over Giozheh, and two or three of the baggage mules got a roll down, but fortunately no serious accident occurred.

The village of Gherradeh is situated in a dell, and buried in a wood of walnut, willow and poplar trees. Many rills descend into the hollow; and indeed there is no want of fine springs all over this country. We passed a great many on our road to-day, after descending Giozheh. Gherradeh belongs to the district of Shehribazar. I am delighted with its situation. The shade of the spreading trees, the murmuring of the little rills, and the singing of some fine thrushes or blackbirds, conspired to render it extremely agreeable.

When we left Sulimania this morning at four o'clock, it was already warm; the wind was east, and as we approached the line of hills they threw out a heat like a reverberator. As soon as we attained the summit of the hills, we found ourselves in a different climate; and we might have prolonged our ride for an hour or two more, without the slightest inconvenience from the heat.

The thermometer at half past two P.M. 99° ; at 10 P.M. 75° .

During our journey to-day we saw a great many vineyards and plantations of tobacco. All the fruit of Sulimania is brought from these parts.

As we had been told at Sulimania that the roads over which we were to pass were very steep, rough, and precipitous, and in some places in the mountains so narrow that two horses could not go abreast, we were obliged to abandon the takht-revan and mohaffas in this excursion, leaving them behind us at Sulimania. The women servants we sent off on horseback last night with the tents and baggage. Mrs. Rich accompanied us on her pony, a present from Osman Bey, which carried her over the mountains admirably.

Omar Aga, who is our mehmandar, called to one of his men to-day by the name of Parveez. He tells me these ancient names are commonly preserved among the tribes, such as Khosroo, Bahram, Parveez, Kobad, Perizad, i. e. Parysatis.

We heard the turtle-doves at this village, for the first time in Koordistan. In the afternoon we had a very pleasant stroll along the side of the dell or glen, through lanes of poplars, blackberries, privet, hawthorn and willow, among vineyards and orchards of plum, peach, mulberry, and figs. We saw one very fine olive tree. Little springs of water gushed from the steep side of the dell everywhere.

July 18.—A fine cool night; but it was of little avail to us, as soon after midnight began a variety of hideous sounds, proceeding from our people beginning to load, which beggared the confusion of Babel, and rendered all further rest impossible. Nothing is undertaken in this country without noise and screaming, which bears no proportion to the work done. The very animals themselves seem to delight in contributing to the confusion; and while their masters are swearing, hallooing, and shrieking, they whine, squeak, snort, and fly at one another incessantly, till the business of loading is concluded, and the whole party fairly on the road.

Omar Aga returned yesterday to Sulimania on business of his own, and will not join us again till this night's station.

At four we set off, first re-ascending the slope by which we descended into the glen, and then shaping our course due east to the hills, or rather mountains, for they now do indeed begin to merit that name. These mountains come round from the Giozheh, or Azmir range, and passing in front of us, with some interruptions, go to form the same range again on our left; but in that direction they seem to diminish in consequence. Directly on our left we had, at the distance of three or four miles, the high mount of Serseer, which is a detached portion of the hills I have been describing. Abdurrahman Pasha was very desirous of transferring his capital to it, on account of its detached and defensible position, its summit being only accessible by one road; but the want of an adequate supply of water deterred him.

At half past four we passed along a ridge, with a small dell on the left, and a very deep and large glen, containing several villages, on the right hand; which glen runs nearly east and west, and at the eastern extremity is shut up by a col, which divides it from another similar glen; and the south sides of both these glens rise at once into a high mountain. Our road gradually ascended. All the country is covered with bushes of dwarf oak. At five we reached the hills at an opening corresponding with the col or eastern head of the glen on our right. Hence Goo-droon bore N. 60 W., and from this situation I could form a pretty good notion of the skeleton of that part of the country. The Giozheh, or Azmir, terminates on the north. Goodroon begins before or south of the termination of Azmir, the valley or dell of Margapa being between them. The Goodroon then forms a range more considerable and more rocky than Azmir, which it sends off in a north-easterly direction. We now descended by a very steep road, and kept winding in a gorge of the mountains, which were steep on either hand, but that on the right was most considerable. The road continually ascended and descended, and was sometimes intersected by valleys. The sides of the hills were covered with vineyards, some of which, in very elevated situations, seemed almost perpendicular, and could certainly only be cultivated by men suspended by cords like samphire-gatherers. The principal cultivation hereabouts is the vine and tobacco. We passed some corn which was not yet got in. Dwarf oaks everywhere abounded; and by the little streams in the valley, willows often intervened with the wild vine. None of the grapes were yet near maturity.

At twenty minutes past six we alighted in a burying-ground, under the shade of some oaks, to rest a little, for I was by no means well. The place where we alighted was a valley, in which several dells or glens united, each discharging its little stream, by which it was formed, into the Tenguzhee, a river which runs hard by. One of these streams turned a mill, and formed a pleasant cascade.

In the hills we saw much chalk in different states, and a good deal of flint. The strata still seemed generally to slope to the east, and the west face of all the hills was the most abrupt.

Having refreshed ourselves a little, at seven we mounted again. Our road the rest of the way was in a north-east direction. At twenty minutes past seven we crossed the Tenguzhee river, now three or four yards over, and about a foot and a half deep; but, from its bed, it is evident that it must occasionally be a considerable torrent. It runs north; doubtless to the Kiupri or Altoon river, which is the great receptacle of all the waters of this part of Koordistan*. From the banks of the Tenguzhee we rose immediately by a very steep ascent, which occupied thirty minutes, at a good hard pull. On our right was the Tenguzhee, which has cut a passage for itself through the mountain. The descent, which commenced immediately—for what we had crossed was a ridge—occupied half an hour, but was a great deal more sloping and gradual than the ascent. Our level was consequently much higher.

We now wound among the hills covered with

* The Tenguzhee river is the same as the Karatcholan river. It runs past Karatcholan, and uniting with the Hareer river, falls into the Kiupri.

dwarf oak, ascending and descending; and at twenty minutes before ten, leaving the direct road and turning south for a few minutes, we arrived at the village of Doladreizh — meaning, in Koordish, “the long valley.”

I found no inconvenience from the sun to-day, though I was very unwell. At two P.M., the hottest time of the day, the thermometer stood at 98° ; at ten at night at 74° .

Near this village, which is our resting place for to-day, are many willows, vines, plum, and fig-trees. On the hills the corn is not yet got in. On our right, parallel with our road, and not far from us, are the high mountains of Kazhav, or Kurree Kazhav. The face of the country to-day was mountainous and beautiful. Here and there the stony sides of the mountains showed themselves, but in general the character of the scenery was not rocky nor abrupt, but undulating.

We found the road to-day excellent, and much better than I had seen in any part of Asia Minor. Some of the views down into the valley reminded me of the Jura.

July 19.—The night-air was quite sharp. At a quarter before four we mounted, and in a few minutes were out of the little valley in which Doladreizh is situated. The general direction of our road was a little south of east; but we wound much along the sides of the hills, generally ascending. The road was really beautiful, winding among woods of oak, which was here of a considerable size, interspersed with sumach, willows, wild vines, and sycamores. We had not proceeded far, when we passed Fet'h ullah Aga, the Ishik Agassi, or Master of the Ceremonies of Mahmood Pasha, returning from Sinna, to which place this is the high road; and shortly after we met an officer belonging to Khaled Bey, the chief of the province to which we are going, at the head of a party of riflemen, who had come thus far to meet me. The officer, who spoke no Turkish, had evidently prepared himself to answer the questions which he thought I might ask; but unfortunately, I did not put them in the order in which he expected, which produced a very laughable equivoue. "How far have we to go?" was my first question. "He went the day before yesterday to Sulimania," was the reply, imagining I had inquired for the Bey.

We soon began a very steep ascent, I think the highest and steepest I had yet seen; but the road was excellent. We attained the summit at six, the ascent having occupied about forty minutes; for half an hour of which it seemed, as we toiled up, to be almost perpendicular. Hence the Kazhav bore due west and old Goodroon reared its bare rocky head, in N. 65 W., above all the other mountains. We immediately began to descend by a beautiful and excellent road, among a thick forest of oaks, through which it ran in a zigzag direction, and was not so steep as the ascent. From the top we had a fine view of the plain, winding among beautifully-shaped hills covered with dwarf oak, the background being formed by the high mountains of Persia, whose outline was also extremely picturesque. Along the plain meandered the river of Kizzeljee, which afterwards runs through a vale on our left, and taking a northerly course, goes through the district of Siwel to discharge itself into the Kiupri Soo. Its source is at the foot of the Persian mountains*. In about forty minutes we reached the foot of the mountain, which runs nearly north and south; and here the road branches into two, that on the left going north-east, to Beestan, the capital of the district of Kizzeljee, and about two hours off, and the one on the right, leading south to Ahmed Kulwan, the proposed place of our residence.

At the foot of the mountain we were met by the two sons of Khaled Bey, at the head of his retainers, in number about two hundred horsemen, well mounted and armed. They were headed by tchaoushes, with silver sticks and little drums, indicative of the rank of the chief, Kizzeljee being a banner or sanjiak of the Ottoman empire. On the junction of the party with ours, a Babel of confusion and noise took place, which is only to be comprehended by one who has seen the honours of an

* That of the Kiupri Soo is at Lajan.

*Istakbol. Horses are inhospitable animals: ours took offence at the strangers who mixed with them, who were indignant in their turn. The Koordish horses are all fiery and ill-broken; and a scene of snorting, neighing, squeaking, stamping, capering, and fighting forthwith began. The young Bey endeavoured to pay compliments to me in Persian, but the horses of his party had better lungs than himself, and had they failed, their place would have been more than supplied by some double drums and zoorna† men, mounted on miserable jades, who composed his band or mehter khana. When they fell into the rear and became silent, the song was taken up by a Stentorian Persian, who roared out Pehlivan or wrestler's ditties, and accompanied himself on the dimbek or single drum, which makes a terrible clattering. The Bey tried to talk, but it was only visibly. I replied in the same way. We rode S. along the foot of the hills, which are scooped out into a beautiful amphitheatre. As soon as we came into good ground, a match of jereeding or throwing the spear, and tilting with the spear, began. The Koords are all desperately bold though unscientific horsemen. The tilting was accompanied by the double drum and zoorna, and the scene was altogether fine and picturesque. One Koord was run away with by his Bucephalus, and another came down horse and all, at full speed, and was much hurt, though not seriously.

* A public entry into a place.

† A trumpet.

At half past seven we arrived at our cantonment under the hills, about a mile north-east of Ahmed Kulwan. Our quarters, which Khaled Bey had had the civility to construct on purpose for us, were situated at the head of a beautiful spring, and consisted of a number of tchardaks, through two of which a little stream of water ran and was formed into a haouz or tank. The whole was surrounded by a neat wattled fence enclosure, and divided by a similar one into haram and divan khaneh. On each side of us were corn-fields in which the reapers were at work, and as they worked they chanted the tale of Ferhad and Shireen in Koordish verse.

The Bey's second son, with five or six gentlemen of the district who had accompanied him, now took their leave to return to Beestan. The eldest, Mahommed Bey, remained with a party to do duty at our cantonment. In the night I heard him going on the patrol himself. This place is much subject to incursions from marauders belonging to the border tribes.

The cotton in this neighbourhood has been greatly injured by the locusts, swarms of which are even yet on the ground*. They consume nothing but what is green.

* The locust is called, in Koordish, koolla.

Soon after sunset we were greatly annoyed by swarms of large and very venomous mosquitoes. The night was cool and the morning quite cold. The ground was wet with dew. At this season there is no dew in the plain of Sulimania.

July 24.—The temperature of a fine spring at our cantonment is 57° . I tried it at all times of the day, and it gave constantly the same result. A spring in the hills above Ahmed Kulwan was 52° . One in a close valley, nearly on a level with our post, was 63° .

On a hill due east of us, on the other bank of the Kizzeljee river, are the remains of a castle called Kiz Kalassi, or the Girl's Castle, in all likelihood Sassanian. Near our cantonment is a clump of poplar trees of the largest size I ever saw. One of them measured sixteen feet in girth, and really was a magnificent tree. Two or three of them were broken down and lying in fine ruins on the ground. I was informed this was occasioned by the weight of snow, the year before last, being greater than they could bear.

About a mile east of Ahmed Kulwan twelve of the Bebbeh family once surprised the camp, and put to flight several thousand Persians. This was in the time of Sultan Shah Hussein. Suliman Bebbeh was chief of Koordistan*, and on that very day he gained a victory over the Turkish army.

* It must therefore have happened some time between 1088 and 1092 of the Hejira. See p. 81, note.

There is a green frog in Koordistan which climbs trees, and catches flies and locusts like a cat, by striking out with its fore paw. I have often seen it perform this feat. It is in every respect like the common frog, but is of an apple-green colour and smooth skin. I have seen them roosting in bushes at night.

I was present at Ahmed Kulwan at a game which would have dislocated the limbs of any but a stout Koord. A man sat on the ground and had a rope tied to one of his legs, which was laid hold of by a large party, who dragged him along the rough stony ground, and whirled him round like men heaving a capstan. A man stood by him, and endeavoured to prevent their hauling him along by keeping hold of another rope, fastened to another part of his body; and if he could catch any of the assailants, without quitting hold of his rope, the man so caught was obliged to sit down and be dragged in his turn. All this was performed with abundance of shouts, shrieks, and capers. A very good-natured savage named Kadera Gavra, or Big Kader, who always attended us, was a principal performer in this sport. He was an excellent fellow, and grew much attached to us. He was remarkable for always stalking about with a club in his hand, dressed in a shaggy goat skin jacket over his other clothes, though the weather was extremely sultry.

August 1.—During my stay at Ahmed Kulwan,

I made no notes, partly from indisposition, partly from occupation, and partly also from idleness. I find I have still too much writing to do for my present state of spirits.

Having stayed some days at Ahmed Kulwan, I determined on quitting it. In this I was principally influenced by the circumstance of the Bey's son insisting on remaining with us the whole of the time we stayed there. I thought it best, therefore, to move to Beestan*, that is, in Persian, Beedistan, the place of willows, the present capital of the district, where his house is, and consequently where we shall give him less trouble. All things being in readiness for our removal, we set out to-day at a quarter past five in the morning, and keeping the hills close on our left, at six we arrived at the river of Kizzeljee, where it forces for itself a passage through the mountains. This place is north from Ahmed Kulwan. On the south side of the pass, or left bank of the river, on a high insulated rock, are the remains of a castle, called the castle of Kizzeljee, and said to be very ancient. The village of the same name is close by it, and was formerly the capital of the district, but some time ago it was abandoned for Beestan. I observe that most of the villages in Koordistan are placed in sheltered nooks, and in valleys out of sight, probably in order to escape the visits of bodies of troops passing to and fro. This however is frequently ineffectual, and the district of Kizzeljee in particular, being a frontier province, is peculiarly obnoxious to the usual calamities of oriental warfare. Within the last twenty years, it has been several times entirely laid waste by the Persians and Aman ullah Khan. Nor are the Koords of rival parties, of the same nation, more merciful towards the villages of the opposite party. Siwell being in the interior, and out of the line of military operations, is a much more tranquil district.

* The change proved unfortunate. We left a healthy for a very unhealthy place, where the fever that prevails in some measure all over Koordistan at this season was peculiarly severe. All our people fell ill at Beestan, and consequently they took a great dislike to Koordistan, and longed to be back in the burning plains of Bagdad, where the natives seem to flourish.—Ed.

We now left the mountains, and stretching across the plain, came to a line which branches out east from them, and is well covered with dwarf oak. Crossing this we reached a vale, through which a river winds beautifully, its banks being clothed with willows. A similar line of hills bounds it on the other side. The Beestan river is sometimes called Tattan, from a village of that name on its banks. It makes its way through the mountains, and joins the Karatcholan and Kizzeljee rivers below Karatcholan. The united streams fall into the Kiupri Soo.

Keeping the mountains we had just crossed on our right, we arrived at half past seven at Beestan; which is a village of about fifty houses * at the foot of these hills, and curiously thrust in, not in the most advantageous situation, under the foot of an insulated rock, about two hundred feet in height, which cuts it off from the vale through which the river flows, and renders its position close and warm. On the south, or right hand, the hills are very high, composed seemingly, like all the hills in this part, of gypsum, variously tinged with iron, and some schistous laminæ, and clothed with dwarf oak. On the left hand is the bare high rock, at the foot of which the village stands, and on whose summit are some vestiges of building. The whole breadth of the interval between the rock and the hills does not exceed a quarter of a mile. Towards the east it is more open, and the view in that direction is bounded by distant mountains, the face of which nearest to us is the district of Teratool in Koordistan; the opposite one is the district of Sakiz in the territory of Sinna, and subject to Persia.

* It contains about fifty families, of which fifteen or twenty are Jews.

Beestan lies N. 10 E. by the compass from Ahmed Kulwan.

Banna N. 10 E. of Beestan; five hours distance.

We found tchardaks prepared for us in the highest part of the village, opposite the Bey's house. The outside of the village would have been more agreeable; but the tchardaks were ready, and I would not hear of further trouble being given on our account. In fact they were the Bey's own tchardaks prepared for his summer accommodation, which he resigned to us.

In the evening I had a conversation with the Bey, on the subject of Koordistan. He says the clamish Koords bear no proportion to the peasant race in numbers, the latter being at least as four or even five to one. Of tribes who move about, he reckons about ten thousand families, consisting, on an average, of seven persons to a tent, which he thinks is a very fair estimate. Of settled tribes, such as the Kermanj, Nooredin, and Shinkees, he does not think there is more than one-third of this number, or about three thousand families*.

August 2. — We clambered up the rock early this morning, in order to see the ruins said to exist on the summit. We saw some traces of wall enclosing it, and found bricks evidently of a Sassanian appearance. On the very top, which is not many yards over, a reservoir is cut in the gypsous strata, and an old thorn-tree still flourishes, which may have seen the castle in its perfect state. We had a fine view of the vale of Tattan, with the river winding through it; and several villages were to be discovered in the opposite hills, E.N.E. of us. At a short distance from the foot of the rock is an artificial mount of a circular form and flat top, like those of Tchemtchemal, Derghezeen, &c. It is called Rustum's Mount. Another of the same description, farther north, is called the Shah's Mount. On some of the neighbouring hills urns of earthenware, of extraordinary dimensions, have been found.

* This refers only to the government of Sulimania, excluding that of Keuy Sanjiak.

August 8.—We have been all ill with a bilious fever, which seems to be the disorder of the place. I have myself suffered much, and twenty-six persons of our party were at one time ill. Last night poor Jaaffer Ali*, who is suffering under the fever, was much alarmed by some Koords bringing in a dead body to the room where he was sleeping, and it was with great difficulty he could persuade them to take it away.

Some evenings ago, when I was better, we strolled out to a very pleasant glen, due south of Beestan, which runs up into the hills. Several springs descend through it, and the sides are covered with wild fig, quince, and pear-trees; and the glen is besides ornamented with magnificent old walnut-trees. The thermometer, on being immersed in a spring-head, marked 60°. There is a spring just opposite the town at the foot of the hill, the temperature of which is 57°.

The hills hereabouts are slate, intersected by veins of gypsum.

The pointed hill of Ardbaba, just over on this side of Bana, bore N. 10 E. A little to the right of it is a part of the same chain, consisting of three curious summits close together called Surena.

* One of the Indian servants, a native of Lucknow.

August 11.—My fever has now settled into a strong tertian. All the people are ill. Mrs. Rich, thank God, has escaped, and so has Mr. Bell; but every hour they come and tell us “Such a one is taken ill.” This is very sad and dismal. The fever has a worse effect on me than on the others, owing to my previous malady. So great was the determination of blood to my head the other night, that Mr. Bell was obliged to take a pound of blood from me, which afforded me great relief.

I am now resolved to quit this place as soon as possible. I have taken measures to send the sepoy and the sick, together with all superfluous baggage, back to Sulimania, and to march with as few incumbrances as possible to a neighbouring village with better air, where we may remain for a few days till we are strong enough to set out on our excursion farther into Koordistan, which may possibly extend as far as Sinna. Besides my fever I have an inflammation in my right eye, which troubles me much and causes me to write with pain, and wholly prevents my observing. It is lucky it only came on after the eclipse of Jupiter’s first satellite, which served me to correct the longitude of Beestan.

August 13.—We left Beestan at five o’clock this morning, and, riding through the plain of Tattan or Beestan, crossed the hills which surround it, and descended into the plain before Ahmed Kulwan, or the plain of the Kizzeljee river*. We crossed it, and arrived at the beautiful village of Penjween at nine, having been delayed a quarter of an hour on the way, the whole of which we performed but slowly. I was so ill, and my eye so much inflamed, that I could neither observe much, nor could I have recorded my observations had I made any.

We were all day among travelling parties, or small encampments of the Jaf Koords, who are now occupying these parts previous to their moving off to Shehrizoor. I regretted I could not enjoy the scene, which was really interesting and picturesque. Their tents and baggage were neatly packed on bullocks and cows. The use of these animals as beasts of burden seems peculiar to the Koordish nation. I remember observing the same custom among the Rishwan Koords, in Asia Minor, of whom, by the bye, the Jafs somewhat reminded me. The men and women travelled on foot, and a fine stout-looking people they were. The women were clothed in a blue chemise and trowsers, and wore on their heads a small cap, their hair seeming to curl about their faces. They wore the tcharokhia, which is a cloak of blue and white checked calico thrown over their shoulders. In its form it resembles the plaid of the Highlanders of Scotland. It is an indispensable part of every Koordish woman's dress: the higher class wear it of yellow and red silk.

* Jackals are found only in the plains of Kizzeljee and Shehrizoor, but in none of the hilly parts.

The Jaf men wore a dress belted round their middles, light drawers, with the worsted shoe, which is a comfortable covering for the feet, and a conical felt cap on their heads. All were armed with a sabre and light target; some added a pistol, and the horsemen always carried a lance. We saw one lady who appeared to be a person of some distinction. She was mounted on a mare, whose bridle and trappings were curiously ornamented with shells and beads, and her saddle was covered with a carpet decorated with tassels. A couple of animals carried her baggage, on which a servant rode, and a well-armed horseman attended her. None of the women had the slightest pretensions to a veil, nor had they even a handkerchief round the lower part of the face like the Arab women.

Penjween, where we take up our quarters for a few days, is a large village, beautifully situated in a glen in the hills, on the south side of the plain of the Kizzeljee river. From this place our old station at Ahmed Kulwan bears about N. 55 W., distant one hour's good pace of a horseman. The old castle of Kizzeljee N. 45 W.

In the daytime we sit in a garden under the shade of a fine walnut-tree, overhanging a spring, the temperature of which is 56°.

The village, though in the district of Kizzeljee, belongs, with a neighbouring one, to Fet'hullah Aga, whose house we occupied at Sulimania. It may be worth about 15,000 piastres per annum, as it has but little cultivation belonging to it. We saw some millet growing, which was still green. The glen is full of gardens, orchards, and vineyards. Scarcely any of the fruit is yet ripe. The inhabitants are mostly carriers, and they take their mules as far as Sinna and Hamadan.

August 18.—Unexpected delays have occurred in procuring the necessary supply of mules for the sepoys. I hope I have at last managed the business, and that all will be ready for them to start for Sulimania to-morrow; in which case we shall, in all likelihood, begin our travels the next day. The people, however, I am glad to say, are mostly better. I hope I have also got rid of my fever, as I had no attack yesterday, which was the day for it. Mrs. Rich, thank God, has escaped an attack. She was indeed ill at Ahmed Kulwan, but without any symptoms of this fever, which is an extremely brisk bilious intermittent, that almost immediately affects the head. Omar Aga says it is common throughout Koordistan at this season. He attributes it to the change of temperature at night, which is sometimes pretty sharp, while the day is extremely hot; but there may be also some local causes, as it is worse at some places than others. The confined valleys and low situations seem to be very bad.

The heliacal rising of Sirius, (in Koordish Ghil-laweizh, for many of the stars have original Koordish names,) about the 10th of August, is the signal in Koordistan for the breaking up of the great heats. The nights then become fresh, but the days are still very hot.

PENJWEEN.

August 19.—Last night two thieves made an incursion into our camp, and succeeded in carrying off two pair of shoes belonging to some of the tent-pitchers. It is very surprising we have not been more troubled with them, considering our vicinity to the tents of the wandering tribes. Apropos—Omar Aga told me last night that the tents we now see in the neighbouring plain belong to the Ghellali, Kel-hore, and some other fragments of tribes, who are now descending from the mountains, and not to the Jafs proper. All these tribes pay tribute to the Vali of Sinna for the permission of summer pasturage in his territory. The Jafs pay four hundred tomauns annually, besides a present of horses and sheep.

I believe I have omitted mentioning that a body of the villagers of every place we come to are always turned out at night to guard our camp. These guards are called Kishakjees, which seems to be a Turkish word, though only used in Persia and Koordistan.

The peasantry of Penjween look well and comfortable, which is rare in these parts. Their houses are separated by wattled enclosures, and have a neater appearance than I have seen in other parts of Koordistan.

There are some families of Jews here, who trade in gall-nuts, hides, &c. with Sinna and Hamadan. Many hides are exported to the latter place. The village Jews in Koordistan are, besides, dyers.

Penjween is the emporium of the wandering tribes. Caravans go from hence to Hamadan in eight days; to Sinna in four.

I greatly lament my ignorance of natural history, as much might be done in that way in Koordistan. I recognise hereabouts the common nettle; the deadly nightshade; the wild hollyhocks, still in full flower; the sumach.

Of birds, besides the redbreast, which I have already mentioned, there are a beautiful kind of woodpecker, of red and grey colours; turtle-doves, one species of which I never saw before, beautifully spotted; quails numerous; and the red-legged partridge in prodigious abundance.

CHAPTER VII.

Entrance into Persia—Lake of Zeribar—Kai Khosroo Bey—Jafen-campment—Djereeding match—Cross Mount Zagros—Garran peasantry—Inclement winter—Jaf quarrel—Sinna—Magnificent collation—The palace—Tyranny of the Vali of Sinna—General mourning—Rebellion—Death of the Vali's son—Despair and cruelty of the Vali—Terror of his subjects—Change in our plans—Consternation of the Vali's ministers—Entreaties of the council—Are successful—Their joy and gratitude—Departure from Sinna for the camp of the Vali.

August 20.—THE necessary cattle for the transport of the sepoy's, the sick, and the baggage having arrived, I resolved on setting out on my trip to Sinna, in which I have for my object the re-establishment of my health, the visiting the chain of Zagros, with its hitherto unknown pass of Garran, and the fixing the position of the capital of Persian Koordistan.

We set out at 5 A.M. ; and as I was desirous of ascertaining the nature of the plain which goes to the foot of Zagros, and the direction of the subordinate hills, we took the road by the plain, though there is one direct across the hills from Penjween, which shortens the distance about an hour. The road through the plain keeps along the foot of the hills which bound the plain of the Kizzeljee river on the south, and winds with them from east into south. They are well wooded to the foot, and often recede into beautiful semi-circular forms, most of the areas of which were occupied by neat little encampments of the tribes, many parties of whom we met on their march. We marched nearly towards the sun, which rendered the inflammation in my eye extremely painful, and prevented me from enjoying the ride, that would otherwise have been very pleasant.

At six A.M. we entered Persia; the frontier of which is marked by a little wooden bridge over a small rivulet which falls into the Kizzeljee, but is frequently dry. The Kizzeljee river soon after disappeared to the right, behind the hills that now separate the plain, which turns more south. We met an elderly man carried on a kind of bier, with his head foremost, as if they were taking him to the grave: he was, however, sitting up and looking about him. Omar Aga, on inquiry, found he had had his leg broken by a stone, in attempting to rob a village the other night.

On ascending a little eminence at half past seven, we saw the small but clear blue lake of Zeribar: in the background to the south were the wild rocky mountains of Avroman, through which there are only foot-paths. The left side of the lake was mountainous and wooded. The right side was a plain, evidently at no very distant period occupied by the lake, which has now shrunk to about three miles in length by two in breadth. All around it, except on the hilly side, where it still retains its original bed, is a morass full of high reeds, about a mile in breadth, and thronged with wild fowl. The beaver is likewise found here. The greatest depth of the lake is said to be near the centre. In the winter it is quite frozen over; and Omar Aga tells me he has often hunted on it*. All the people of the country believe this lake to have been once a city, which God caused to be swallowed up by an earthquake on account of the wickedness of its governors. Omar Aga says it has sensibly diminished in his recollection.

Hitherto our direction was about S. 70 E., but hence the tents of the Jaf chief, Kai Khosroo Bey, bore south, though we still kept to the foot of the hills, with the lake about a couple of miles on our left, and our road wound round in a semi-circular direction.

We were soon met by four tchaoushes belonging to the Bey; handsome, well-mounted men, with plumes of herons' feathers in their turbans. Under their horses' bellies were carpets, from which depended a profusion of yellow worsted tassels.

At half past nine we arrived at Kai Khosroo Bey's camp, about two miles south of the lake. Before we reached the camp we were met by the Bey himself, mounted on his magnificent horse, the finest animal I have seen for many years, accompanied by his three sons, and Mahommed Bey his nephew, the son of the last Jaf chief, Kader Bey. Kai Khosroo Bey looked in much better spirits than I usually saw him in at Sulimania. He was superbly dressed in a rich Constantinople capote with gold bosses, and made a very fine figure. His eldest son, a very handsome lad, was habited in a similar manner, over a robe of rich European brocade; the youngest, a white-headed boy, was dressed in black velvet and silver. Many fine-looking Jaf horsemen accompanied him; and a match of djereeding, in which the young men distinguished themselves, commenced and lasted till we got to the camp. The Bey's tents were of the usual black stuff, surrounded by tehghs or mats, but high and spacious, and a divan canvass tent was prepared for me to receive my visitors, and a comfortable tehardak, which had belonged to the Bey's haram, was given up for my own accommodation and that of Mrs. Rich. The Bey's women waited in it to receive her. Our reception was kind and hospitable in the extreme; but here I must close my journal of to-day, and leave much to memory. Inflamed eyes and throbbing temples completely unfit me for writing.

* There is a profusion of the Lotus (Nilofer) in the Lake Zeribar.

On a hill due south * of us is the castle of

* Surena bears N.; Ardbaba, the peaked summit over Banna, N. 10 W.

Meriwan *, now in ruins; I believe it is Sassanian. On the very pinnacle of another hill, forming the south side of a valley about three miles broad, which runs up east to the foot of Zagros, are the ruins of two Sassanian castles, bearing S. 55 E. and S. 60 E. of our camp, distant about two or three miles.

The bare precipices of Avroman bear due south of us, and extend westward, overlooking Shehrizoor; whose plains are separated from us by the hills which come down from Ahmed Kulwan to Penjween and the lake. Between Avroman and Zagros is a narrow valley, through which runs a direct road to Kermanshah from Sulimania, called the Shamian road. Through this valley flows a little river which comes down from Garran, and falls into the Diala. The chain of Zagros is bare and high †. It is visible at intervals from Surena and Ardbaba, which I am now satisfied are part of Zagros. Hajee Ahmed, that part of Zagros to which the Jafs retire in summer, lies from hence N. 60 E. Zagros seems to incline easterly from Ardbaba, in the district of Banna, to Garran, and thence to come out more westerly, in the direction of our road to-morrow. The pass of Garran is N. 85 E. In the afternoon the young Beys had a match of djereeding, to show off before Mrs. Rich. At night I sat some time with Kai Khosroo Bey; we had some Persian singing by two Mullas. Some Indian Fakeers were present ; and an elderly woman perfectly naked, but very quiet and well behaved. It was a disgusting sight. She is subject to the epilepsy, and was once mad, when she threw off her clothes and took to the mountains, where she lived for some years in a perfect state of wildness. She was at last reclaimed, and is now quiet, but cannot be persuaded to put on clothes. She sometimes visits Sulimania, where she walks about the streets in a state of perfect nudity.

* Meriwan is the name of the district we are in: it belongs to Sinna.

† Direction N. 10 W. to S. 30 E.

This must suffice for my journal at the Jaf camp. I find, if I have any regard for my health and comfort, I must abridge my journal as much as possible, and confine it to an indication of the principal occurrences. I have, besides the inflammation in my eye, been tormented with a pain at the back of my head ever since my fever began ; and too much writing always distresses me now.

August 21.—Took leave of our kind entertainer (whose disinterested hospitality I shall never forget) at half past five, and proceeded down the valley, formed by a prolongation of the hill of Meriwan on the south, and of the hills of Ziribar on the north in the general direction noted yesterday, viz. N. 85 E., though the road was not in a straight line, but wound a little. At the end of it we crossed a little line of hills, and at half past seven arrived at Gueizakwera (which means a spoilt walnut), a little village in a narrow dell. In the valley through which we passed was fought the battle (if such it may be called, which was over in ten minutes) in which Suliman Pasha, then Kiahya of Bagdad, was taken prisoner, with the best part of his army, by Abdurrahman Pasha, the Koordish chief, in the mad expedition undertaken by Ali Pasha of Bagdad against Persia. I rode to-day in much pain on account of my eye, our road being directly against the sun. The houses, or rather huts, in Gueizakwera are covered with a kind of inartificial thatching of long reeds, thrown over a ridge pole, and hanging down, the whole roof being high and narrow. We were in a hut of a better description, which I believe serves for the mosque. All the houses are separated from each other by an enclosure of wattles. It is a miserable village; though Sheikh Kereem, one of the naybs of the district (there are two), resides in it. He is a well-behaved man, dressed in the Bebbeh, not the Persian fashion. I left two of my men, who were too ill to go on, under his charge*.

August 22.—We were off by five, and proceeded through a hilly but open country till six, when we came to the entrance of a narrow valley, formed by two stupendous cliffs, which reared their bare heads above the oak woods that cover their declivities. The small river of Aserabad or Garran flows through the pass, and is crossed by a neat bridge of three arches, built by Aman ullah Khan, the present Vali of Sinna. We had been rising very gently ever since we left the village, but now we began to ascend sensibly, keeping the Aserabad on our left for about a mile. It flows into the Diala. Our direction to the bridge was N. 70 W., thence S. 70 E.; the road extremely beautiful, through woods of oak, ash, wild-pear, vine, and tehinar or oriental plane, which cover the hills almost to their summits; and among them we remarked hawthorn and a gigantic wild-rose. It was enlivened by a large division of the Jafs, proceeding to the plains of Ziribar with their families and flocks. Their property was loaded on bullocks. The children were carried in cradles at the women's backs; or, if a little bigger, were loaded, two and three together, on the back of a mare or bullock. Several most masculine sibyls (complete Meg Merrilies) strode along with the other women; they seemed to be of great authority in taking charge of the parties. The men sauntered on, with a heavy mace at their girdle, and a sword and a target over their backs. Some drove the flocks of sheep, goats and horses, and a few of the better sort rode; but the care of the families and loads always devolved on the women.

* One died soon after; the other returned to me at Banna.

They are a hard-featured, sturdy race. The road was excellent; the vale through which we ascended very narrow. At ten minutes before eight we came to the foot of a very steep ascent in the same direction, the road not winding much; at a slow progress it occupied us forty-five minutes in ascending. The mountains were gypsous and slaty. At half past eight we reached the top of the Col, and saw higher summits on either hand quite bare. We almost immediately began descending by a steep path, the wood became more rare, and was confined to the dwarf oak. The mountains on all sides were bare, and, as far as the view extended, nothing but a sea of naked brown hills was visible—a dismal prospect after what we had just quitted. At five minutes past nine we reached the foot of the pass, and sat down to our breakfast, which we found prepared under some willows by a little brook.

This pass of Zagros is called Garra, from the name of a peer, or saint, as I am informed, though it is certainly no Mahometan name. The pass of Ardbaba to Banna is reckoned easier. This entrance into Persia is by no means pleasing; every thing looks burnt and bare; and there is said to be no more wood eastward to the frontiers of India.

At half past ten we mounted again: our road thence wound through high, bare, unsightly hills of crumbling slate, covered with a slight reddish soil; and there were no signs of population or cultivation. Our road S. 70 E. At a quarter to twelve we reached a little river (which must at times be a considerable torrent) called Kakor Zekria*. We crossed the river twice, and then quitted it, leaving it on our left hand. At five minutes before one we struck out of the high road up a very narrow valley; and at five minutes past one arrived at the miserable village of Jenawera, still in the district of Meriwan, which is the largest of the dependencies of Sinna. The Gooran peasantry are by no means so good looking as those of Turkish Koordistan.

August 23.—We mounted at a quarter past five this morning. Our direction was S. 50 E. for about half an hour, until we reached the high road. Our general direction then was S. 80 E. all day; but the road wound through the sinuosities of narrow valleys, and sometimes over the hills which separate them. On the whole the ascents seemed more than the descents. The country was of the same unpleasant aspect as yesterday. In some places we observed the water was conducted in little earthen trenches for cultivation. Omar Aga says the soil is too poor here to be susceptible of culture without artificial irrigation. The winter is very inclement, and the snow lies deep and long. At ten minutes before seven we passed, close on our left, an artificial mount with a flat top, like Tchemtchemal. It is in a narrow valley, close at the foot of a hill. The natives call it the kalaa, or castle, though a castle it could never have been, as it might be attacked even with stones from the neighbouring hills. After having continued ascending almost all the way from Jena-wera, we descended for about a quarter of an hour, and arrived at the foot of the descent at eight o'clock. We immediately after, however, rose again by a very steep ascent, of which we attained the summit at half past eight, and had a fine view of the line of mount Zagros. The descent was inconsiderable.

* The Kakor Zekria runs westerly to Shamian, and thence, round in the direction of Gavro, it falls into the Diala.

At ten minutes past nine we arrived at the tents belonging to the villagers of Berruder, in a narrow valley. The village itself is over the hills on the left, about a mile off. The Berruder peasants always encamp in the summer on this spot. They had just cut the corn, and were treading it out with mules and oxen.

Here I received a messenger from Sulimania; and this is only the third day since he left that place, though he travelled on foot.

I immersed the thermometer in a fine spring near the camp, and was surprised to find it 61°.

Among the straw I found a large insect of the locust kind, about four inches long. It had no wings; but had a kind of sword projecting from the tail. It bites pretty severely, but does no harm to the cultivation. The Koords call it sheera kulla, or the lion locust*. We also found a mole, called in Koordish mousha kwera, or the blind mouse.

August 24.—About fifteen days ago some Jafs had a quarrel with some people in the neighbourhood, and wounded one of them badly with a sabre. To-night three Jafs were passing with some cattle, when six or seven horsemen of the neighbourhood assembled, drove off the Jafs, and seized the cattle. Omar Aga hearing of it, immediately sent off four of his horsemen, who in about half an hour returned into camp with the cattle, which they had recovered, and two prisoners. In the course of the night the comrades of the prisoners came and made up the affair. The men were given back; but the cattle were restored to the right owners.

At half-past five we mounted: the morning air was quite sharp. Soon after leaving the village we crossed a pretty high and steep hill. Our road all the day wound through very narrow valleys among the slaty hills, through which ran a little stream whose course was easterly: it goes towards Gavro, and falls into the Diala. It ran through a bed of reeds and willows, whose green formed a pleasing contrast with the burnt appearance of the slaty hills. We saw also many wild rose-bushes, and a tree called in Persian senjed, in Koordish *sinjov, which bears a small fruit like a jujube.

* This is the חרגול (chargol) of the Talmudists, or Garam of the Cape of Good Hope.—See Ludolf, De Locustis, pp. 13, 14.

At eight we alighted on the banks of the little river to refresh ourselves, and after a short halt we mounted again at twenty minutes to nine; and at half past nine arrived at the large dirty village of Doweisa, consisting of miserable hovels with flat roofs, built on the side of a bare black slate hill. There are, however, many gardens and vineyards in the valley and on the sides of some neighbouring hills, which make the place look better than any we have seen since we passed Garra. The higher class of people here wear the Persian dress, which fashion is entirely followed by the women.

Our stage to-day was three hours and twenty minutes, the direction northward of east; but I was not well enough to observe the compass frequently.

Doweisa, where we halt for to-day, is in the district of Husnabad, in which is also the capital of the province, Sinna, which lies south-east of this village, at about three farsakhs distance†.

August 25.—Last night Mirza Fyzullah, one of the Vali of Sinna's secretaries, arrived at the village. It seems the Vali, who is out on an excursion in his northern provinces, has heard of our arrival in his territory, and has sent orders to Sinna that I should be lodged in his palace and received exactly with the same honours as himself. His second son, who is now nominally governor of the town, is consequently preparing to come out to meet me at the head of all the troops, which is precisely the very thing I am anxious to avoid; I therefore positively refused the intended honour. The Khan's orders, however, were precise, and he is not a man to be disobeyed even in trifles; I had, therefore, considerable difficulty in avoiding the ceremony, and only escaped by positively declaring that I would immediately return to the place from whence I came if they insisted. I also promised to explain my reasons to the Khan. I at last got off with a compromise, however, that two or three of the principal men should receive me at the Vali's garden, where for the present I propose to take up my abode. The Mirza brought with him a letter from Mahommed Khan, the little prince, with a present of six mule-loads of fruit and one of snow.

* In Turkish, idjee.

† According to Major Rennel, the farsakh is little short of $3\frac{1}{2}$ British miles. See "Illustrations of the Retreat of the Ten Thousand," p. 4. Mr. Fraser, in his interesting "Journey into Khorassan," p. 367, says, "The Khorassane farsakh is rather more than that of Irak;" rather less than 4 British miles.

This negotiation detained me till half-past six, when we set out. The country was still the same, but rather more open, and in some valleys we noticed gardens and vineyards, with a few small villages. The level of the country descended as we approached the town, behind which it again rose, and after several breaks and hills, terminated in the high ridge of the Bazir Khani hills running north and south. Over this range, which is of no great length, are the roads to Hamadan and Teheraun*.

We proceeded but slowly, especially the latter part of the road, as I felt myself extremely unwell, and was much troubled with my old giddiness in the head.

Sinna wore a much more imposing appearance than I expected, with its castellated palace on a height, and some good-looking buildings round the foot of it. When we came near the town, we turned off to the right to the garden of the Khosrooabad, which is less than a quarter of a mile to the south-west of the town, and is situated on a slope that runs from the foot of a pretty high hill down to the town. At a distance it looked like a plantation of poplars, the garden having no other wall or defence than this tree very closely planted all round it. We arrived at the gate of it at ten minutes before ten, and were certainly agreeably surprised by the spectacle which met us. We were ushered up avenues of poplars of great height and beauty, to a magnificent garden-house of great elevation, with a fine square tank full of jets d'eau in front and at the back of it. All the jets d'eau were playing, and round the sides of the tank were disposed baskets of fine-looking fruit. The pavilion was lofty, and elegantly painted and gilded in the Persian taste. In it was a magnificent collation of fruit, very tastefully displayed, and we had a fine view down the grand centre avenue of the garden, which was really striking. The garden was planted by Aman ullah Khan, the present Vali, about fourteen years ago, and was named by him Khosrooabad, in honour of his father, Khosroo Khan, the late Vali. It is a piece of ground of six hundred ghez shahee square*, divided into squares by avenues of poplars, with one grand centre avenue. The compartments were filled with fine fruit-trees of every species that will grow in this climate, and the vicinity of the pavilion and the grand avenue were planted with flowers and flowering shrubs.

* The Bazir Khani hills terminate in a plateau, which is the elevation of Hamadan, there being scarcely any descent after reaching the top of these hills.—Ed.

I was received at the garden-gate by Mirza Faraj Ullah, the uncle of the little prince, who is now at Sinna; Inayet ullah Bey, one of the principal men of the town, and some other gentlemen whose names I do not recollect.

In the afternoon I received an express courier from the Vali himself, entreating me, after I had rested myself at Sinna, to return to Sulimania by the road on which he now is; and as this will not detain me much, and will show me some new and interesting places, I mean to comply with his request.†

* Each ghez shahee is about $\frac{1}{16}$ English yard.

† The Vali spoke in his letter of having heard of, and long wished to see Mr. Rich.—Ed.

I had not yet in the East seen so fine a garden and pavilion, and I was consequently much struck with it. It is, like all these kind of works, an imitation of the Tcharbagh at Ispahan, and of the other places of the same kind of the age of the Seffiviyeh dynasty.

After waiting till we were quite exhausted by hunger, a splendid breakfast, or rather a very solid dinner, was served: each one had a separate tray. About ten at night a similar meal was again served up.

The gentlemen whom I met with here (all of the Gooran race) spoke the Gooran Koordish among themselves, but used Persian in conversing with me. They were all habited in the Persian costume, the effect of which is not pleasing. They are by no means so open or manly as my friends the Bebbehs. The Persian dress and manners are certainly against them; but, besides this, I believe they are reckoned inferior in these respects to the other Koords: they have the appearance of something sneaking about them; as Omar Aga would say, 'They are not clansmen.' I must confess he forms a very striking contrast to them; and he looks, with his military, frank deportment, his flowing dress, and party-coloured turban, thrown back off his fine manly forehead, like a prince among them. I find he is well known and highly respected here.

August 26.—The Persians are by no means so truly polite as the Turks in one respect—they will not leave you to yourself. A Turkish chief would have welcomed you to his house, and not shown himself again till you desired it, especially where there was a lady. The Persians are crowding about you day and night, there is no getting rid of them, and it avails us nothing being out of town. Mrs. Rich cannot stir out of her room to get a walk in the garden. I understand we should be better able to bow them off if we were in town; and as they wish us to occupy the apartments prepared for us in the palace, and I desire to see something of the town, I agreed to the proposal, and left the garden this morning. After riding down the slope on which the garden is situated, to a dirty ravine, in a few minutes we arrived at the outer wall of the town, which is of mud, and thence ascending a rough and bad street, reached the gate of the castle or palace, where we found the guard turned out to receive us. This guard consisted of about a hundred Avramis or Fusileers from Avroman, who have the privilege of guarding the palace. They were very wild-looking fellows, (but not of the clannish physiognomy,) clothed in a coarse white woollen dress, cut something in the Persian fashion. On their heads they wore a curious cap of black felt pointed at the top, and terminating at the bottom in fine long points, something like a spider. They rested on their long rifles, and stared at us as we passed along.

We were ushered through a court to a good room

THE NATIONAL ANTHROPOLOGICAL ARCHIVES

Gift of the Smithsonian Institution

situated on a fine terrace which overlooks the town, and in a few minutes the little Khan came to see me. He is a fine little boy, about nine or ten years old, but with a steadiness and gravity of demeanour far beyond his years, evidently assumed for the occasion. Inayet ullah Bey, who had twisted a shawl round his cap in the court-fashion, acted as spokesman and master of the ceremonies. Mirza Faraj ullah stood by his nephew, and every one as they came into the room, servants and all, saluted the little prince by bending the body in a very ungraceful way, but he took no notice of any.

Coffee, sherbet, and trays of sweetmeats were brought. The little Khan presented me with coffee and sherbet, with his own hand. I remarked that all the Persians ate immoderately of the sweetmeats. No conversation of any interest took place. Sundry hyperbolical compliments passed, and after the Khan took his leave we were walked about the palace.

A new pavilion is building at the end of the terrace near the entrance, which is called the Khosroowia, in honour of the Khan's eldest surviving son, whose name was Khosroo Khan, but it has been changed lately to Mahommed Ali, for good luck. Close to the room appropriated to me is the old hall of audience, built by Khosroo Khan, the father of Aman ullah Khan at the birth of his son the present Vali, that is, forty-seven years ago. The painting and gilding, which was once handsome, is now out of repair. It is wainscoted with alabaster to the height of about four feet, and painted with flowers ; in the upper compartments are sundry paintings representing the battle of Kalderan ; that between Tamerlane and Bajazet ; portraits of some of the Seffiviyeh race of kings of Persia ; one of the present king of Persia with his preposterous beard ; and of Alexander the Great, with a watch lying by him, dressed in the Persian fashion, and with the face of a coquetish woman. It is curious, however, that they have the tradition of his having been a beardless and beautiful young man.

The front of the hall is open and supported by pillars ; at the back of it is an alcove, which the Persians call Shah-nasheen, highly ornamented, with a little fountain in it, and glass windows to the hall which may be let down at pleasure. This kind of hall is called talar. They are all imitations of the Seffiviyeh buildings at Ispahan. This talar is upwards of fifty feet long by twenty-five broad, exclusive of the alcove.

Turning round a corner on the same terrace, which is ornamented with shrubs and flowers, is the new Hall of Audience, built by Aman ullah Khan about four years ago. This room is larger than the talar, and enclosed in front with beautifully-painted windows. It is a very splendid room. The wainscot is of semi-diaphanous marble or alabaster, beautifully painted and gilt, in a tasteful pattern and rich, harmonious colours. The steps are of the same alabaster, which is brought from a hill on the road to Hamadan, and is dug out with much trouble.

The effect is greatly spoiled by the upper compartments, which are occupied by large tawdry kind of sign-post paintings, representing Solomon and the Queen of Sheba, the Battle of Delhi, Nadir Shah restoring the crown to the Mogul, and sundry other performances of a similar description ; and worse than all, certain upright figures said to be portraits of the Emperor of Russia, the Prince of Wales, the Governor-General of India, the King of Spain, the Emperor of Germany, and Bonaparte with a gun and bayonet in his hand. These were all horrible daubs, without the slightest resemblance either in person or costume, except that of the Emperor of Russia, which you could just tell who it is meant for. His Iranian majesty again figures with his hideous beard and pound weight of jewels. On the sides of the hall are two little galleries, called *bala khoneh, beautifully ornamented. The whole is one blaze of gold and brilliant colours. The alabaster skirting is really both splendid and beautiful ; and if, instead of the aforesaid daubs, it were surmounted by paintings of Rubens, whose richness would harmonize well with the rest of the room, or in want of these, which are not easily to be had, by Gobelin tapestry,—the room would be worth going to see in any part of Europe. Farther on, in another court, is a little room or cabinet, lined with looking-glass, and most strangely ornamented with decanters, cups, glass bottles, punch-bowls, &c.

* From whence comes balcony in English.

This is the great delight of the Persians, and they grinned and looked in my face for signs of surprise as they showed me this cabinet of curiosities. Still farther on, in another court, is a neat little oratory, and many other buildings not yet completed, in one of which an English bow window projected over the terrace or platform. The palace when finished will be very handsome; but there are a great number of Oriental incongruities observable, such as dark, narrow and dirty passages, break-neck stairs, &c.

I forgot to mention that, in the new hall, is a painting representing the battle of Meriwan, in which Aman ullah Khan and his Goorans make the prominent figures, and Suliman Kiahya is brought prisoner before him. It happens, as already noticed*, that neither the Goorans nor the Persians were in the action, which was over in ten minutes, and the Kiahya surrendered to Abdurrahman Pasha.

Aman ullah Khan possesses in common with all the Persians a rage for building. It is a fancy, indeed, which he can easily indulge, as he forces all the tradesmen to work gratis for him, and in return gives them certain privileges, such as taking cattle from the peasants for carriage, when they have occasion, exemption from receiving public guests and government officers, protection against creditors, and certain other equally equitable indulgences.

* See pp. 190, 191.

A very handsome mosque, the improvements in the palace, some baths, and caravanserais, a large bazaar round a Meidan, but which is far from being well stocked, and other works, attest his taste and his tyranny. The traveller admires the magnificence of Aman ullah Khan, but the unfortunate citizen and peasant groan when his buildings are mentioned.

The palace is situated on a high mount, which overlooks all the town, and is surrounded by a mud wall in a very bad condition. At the foot is part of the town, and then again another embattled wall, beyond which is more of the city, which again is surrounded by a wall. Aman ullah Khan has greatly extended the city within the last few years. Some good-looking houses built of bricks were visible from the terrace: the ordinary habitations are of mud, like those of Sulimania. The town is every way surrounded by higher ground than itself, and is situated on a slope which runs down to a valley filled with gardens and vineyards, so that the streets are all up and down. From the valley the ground rises again in broken hills, which terminate in the Bazir Khani range before mentioned.

Intermittent fevers are not uncommon here in the spring and autumn. They have been every where more rife this year, and there has been a sensible diminution of the waters all over Persian and Turkish Koordistan. The castle and the higher grounds about Sinna are reckoned healthy.

I returned to my room fatigued from viewing the palace (I do not much enjoy looking over any house); and was not sorry to find a sumptuous breakfast, or rather dinner prepared, after which I lay down to rest myself in the talar. When I got up, some of the ayans, or principal gentlemen, came to see me; and in the dusk of the evening Mrs. Rich came in from the garden. Dinner was, as usual, not brought in till ten o'clock, and I understand the Persians are usually even later than this hour.

August 27.—From Mirza Fyzullah I learnt that the Koords have a general name for Zagros, which they call Shahoo*. This name is the common denomination for the mountain in Juanroo; but it is also understood as the general appellation by the better informed Koords of these parts, who say it reaches down between Shiraz and Bushire, and thence to Bender Abbassi.

Sinna†, which was formerly situated on a flat mount, south of the present town, was built one hundred and seventy-five years ago, by an ancestor of

* Anquetil du Perron says that, in the Parsee books, Mount Elwend, near Hamadan, is called Shaho.

† The proper name of Sinna is Sinendrij—Sinna is a colloquial abbreviation.

Aman ullah Khan's. It now contains about four or five thousand families. There are two hundred families of Jews, and fifty houses of the Chaldean Catholic rite, dependent on the Patriarch of Diarbekir, and in the diocese of Mousul. They have a church and a priest, and are all tradesmen or merchants in a very small way*. The Mahometan inhabitants of the town are all Sunnis of the Shafei sect. The Vali and his family affect to be Shiyyahs, in order to please the King of Persia.

We have arrived at a very distressing moment at Sinna, as there is a general mourning in the place on the following account: the Vali's eldest son, Mahommed Hussein Khan, whose mother was a woman of low rank, the daughter of a seraff or banker in the town, was in consequence excluded from the succession, in favour of his second brother, Mahommed Ali or Khosroo Khan, whose mother was of the first family in Sinna after that of the Vali himself, and who was besides the Vali's favourite son. Some quarrels arose between the brothers, in which the father showed a marked preference for the younger. Mahommed Hussein Khan became disgusted, and some designing people availed themselves of this to foment the dissensions. They promised him support, and at last persuaded him to run away from Sinna, which he did a few months ago, at the head of a considerable body of followers, for he was very popular. He took the road between the territories of Bagdad and Kermanshah, and on his way plundered some of the tribes under his father's government, which were pasturing in the plains of Bagdad and Khanakeen. The Vali, having procured permission from the King of Persia, pursued his son at the head of an army. I arrived at Khanakeen and Kasr i Shireen a couple of days after he had left those places, in March last*. He at last came up with his son in the territory of Kermanshah. A battle ensued, in which both sides fought with considerable fury. The Vali had given strict orders that no one should fire at or wound his son; but in the confusion the young man received a wound, of which he died shortly after his arrival at Sinna, to which place he was brought after the action. The Vali was almost distracted. He beheaded a great number of his son's followers on the spot; and after his return to Sinna he put to death upwards of a hundred considerable persons. Nearly four hundred more fled to Kermanshah, and the Vali turned out their wives and families beggars, ruined their houses, and confiscated their property.

* Carpets of a superior quality to those of Kermanshah are made in Sinna.

His second son, Mahommed Ali, or Khosroo Khan, who is to be his successor, is a lad of about fifteen years old. He has already received the patent of succession from the Shah, and is affianced to one of the Shah's daughters. The marriage is to take place at the approaching Noorooz, and is to be celebrated at Teheraun with great splendour. In the meantime the Vali is going about screwing his subjects to their utmost endurance to procure money for the expenses, which, including the necessary presents to the Shah, will be enormous. The little boy who is left at Sinna is named Mahommed Khan, and is about ten years old. The Vali has eight sons in all.

* An account of the excursion here referred to by Mr. Rich will be found in another part of these volumes.—Ed.

Aman Ullah Khan, the Vali of Sinna *, is forty-seven years of age, and is said to be a perfect master of Persian politeness, elegance, and policy. The Persians themselves say he can outwit any of them; and all agree that his cunning and duplicity set all precautions at defiance. His manners are represented to be so insinuating, and his tact so perfect, that he can gain whomsoever he pleases; but he has always a selfish object in what he does, and no reliance can be placed on him. He is cruel and avaricious even beyond the generality of Persian governors. All the province trembles when his name

* There were formerly four Valis or tributary princes in Persia, viz. the Princes of Georgia, Sinna, Loristan, and Haweiza; but the Vali of Sinna is the only one remaining. The Prince of Haweiza was called Mevla, or holy, and was a Seyd or supposed descendant of the Prophet. Kelb Ali Khan, the murderer of Messrs. Grant and Fotheringham, is descended from the Valis of Loristan, who were of the Feili tribe.

is mentioned. He is splendid in his establishment, and is supposed to be possessed of immense wealth. The greater portion of it has been gained in commerce, and he has money in the hands of many merchants, who trade with it for him. He has more than fifty thousand sheep, which he distributes about to different people to take care of for him, with the proviso, that whenever he calls for them, however distant the period may be, they must always be forthcoming; that is, that they must never grow old, never get sick, never die, or be eaten by wolves. He is partner with every merchant and tradesman in his territory; or rather he is the general monopolizer. I wanted a new box for my sextant; all the wood and even the carpenter were the property of the Vali, and I was obliged to get an order from Mirz Feraj ullah. The same thing happened when I wanted a green silk string for my pistols. I desired Ovanness* to see if he could get me some wine. He applied to a Christian, who told him he durst not let him have any without an order, as the Vali knew every bottle in his house. All the Vali's partners must take care that his profits are regular, whatever may be their luck. The Kiurkjee Basha, or pelisse-maker to the

* Cofa Ovanness was one of the native secretaries attached to the Bagdad residency. He was an Armenian by birth, of the Roman Catholic persuasion, and highly esteemed by Mr. Rich for his uprightness, in a country where it is rare, his fidelity, simplicity of character, and affectionate disposition.—Ed.

Vali, is a Christian. The Vali gave him a hundred tomans to traffic with on his account, upon this condition, that he shall pay him regularly twenty tomans a year. The poor man finds this a very losing concern, and would gladly give back the money, but he dare not even propose this. The Vali is now on a progress through his districts. The people of Sakiz sent to offer him six hundred tomans if he would not visit their town. He answered that he would both come and have a thousand tomans. I have heard a dozen more anecdotes of a similar kind. Some time ago four of the principal men of Sinna went to throw themselves at the feet of the King of Persia, to complain of the tyranny of the Vali, and to implore his Majesty's protection. The king sent the men to his son Mohammed Ali Mirza, from whom the Vali sought to buy them. A bargain was struck, after which the Vali offered the Prince two thousand tomans more, if he would cause their eyes to be put out at Kermanshah, and then send them to him. This was agreed to, and the unfortunate men were blinded and then sent prisoners to Sinna.

This morning I went to see the little Khan. He was sitting in the shahnazeen of the talar. Inayet ullah Bey and another nobleman in court-dresses were with him. Refreshments were served as before, but little interesting conversation took place. Many questions were asked about Frenghistan, to most of which Omar Aga, who is now very learned on these subjects, saved me the trouble of answering. Every one here asks after Malcolm with great interest.

In the afternoon some of the Khan's family came to see me. I received them in the talar, as the little Khan holds his divan in the morning and I mine in the afternoon.

The Khans who came to see me were Shir Mahommed Khan, a brother of the Vali's, Subhan Verdi Khan, an uncle of the Vali's, and Ahmed Khan his cousin. They all wore the court-dress, and were very gentlemanly, elderly men. They talked of the antiquity of their family, which they said had been Princes of Sinna for nearly 700 years. The name of the family is Mamooi, and it is really very ancient; but, being of the Gooran or peasant caste, is not esteemed by the clansmen. They told me that Ardelan was originally the name of a celebrated personage of their family*, and that since his time the rulers of these provinces have been called Valis of Sinna Ardelan, as those of Sulimania are called Mirimirans of Baban. Some have thought Ardelan was a territorial denomination only, but this they assured me was quite a mistake. One of the Khans observed, when I praised some of the buildings, that they spent all their money about their houses, but that the Bebbehs invested their property in money and transportable effects, that they might be ready to fly at a moment's warning, in case of troubles or the deposition of their chief. Omar Aga immediately answered, " Yes, you spend money about houses, because it is indifferent to you who is chief; you are content to remain where you are. We are always ready to follow our chief wherever he goes, through troubles, and difficulties, and dangers, and we keep our property ready for him in his distress." This was no mere boasting, but most strictly true, as I could prove by many anecdotes of circumstances which have occurred within my own knowledge. If Aman ullah Khan were deposed, not a single man would follow him except some menials whom he could afford to pay. But if Mahmood Pasha of Sulimania were deposed, all his relations would instantly leave their country and follow him, giving him up whatever they possessed in ready money and effects, and would even work at daily labour to bring their pittance to contribute to his support and comfort. Nothing can be more marked than the difference of spirit in the clansmen and Goorans, who are a timid and heartless race, and said to be meaner, more thievish, and more deceitful even than the Persians.

* As Bebbeh was one of the family of Kermanj.—Ed.

One thing I observe in the Persian manners which is certainly pleasing; there is no shifting nor petty manœuvring, as among the Turks, to avoid sitting below or rising up to a European. They always endeavour to place you above themselves, and treat you in every respect as they would one of their own great men.

This evening Mr. Bellino set out on an antiquarian excursion to Hamadan and Kermanshah.

August 28.—This evening the Serbazes, or regular troops, were reviewed before me. The Vali has about 300 of them, which he raised a year ago, in imitation of those of Abbas Mirza, who sent him a sort of Russian officer to drill them, with a drum and fife, and a few Russian soldiers. The drill is after the English fashion, and it was curious to hear the Persian drummers and fifers beating off The British Grenadiers. The officer and the best of the Serbazes are now with the Vali, and only a hundred remain here, who they tell me are only recruits. They were very like Falstaff's host. They wore the common Persian cap and the long Persian dress, stuffed into white linen drawers, which looked very ill, and they were very sad performers. Too much had evidently been attempted with them in so short a time. They had good English muskets, which the Vali purchased of the Shah, who drives a trade in this way, getting them from India and selling them at an advanced price to his sons and subjects. The word of command was given by a Russian, and the commandant of the battalion stood by with a shepherd's crook in his hand, which he occasionally bestowed on the heads and legs of the men. He was out of uniform, in a common Persian dress.

The Vali has many Nomadic Koords under his jurisdiction. These are branches of the Sheikh Ismaeli, the Merdemeh, the Kelhore, and Jaf tribes. The Jafs were formerly all subjects of Sinna, inhabiting the province of Juanroo.

August 29.—The territory of Sinna* is divided into seven boluks or provinces, namely, Juanroo on the S.W. extremity, Avroman, Merivan, Banna, Sakiz (on the Tabreez road), Hassanabad, in which is Sinna, and Isfendabad on the Hamadan road. Each of these provinces is divided into four or five mahalls† or smaller districts. Two of the above-mentioned provinces, Avroman and Banna, have for a long period been governed by the same family from which the Vali, however, always chooses the governor; and from this I conclude that these districts were originally independent, and submitted to the Vali of Sinna by treaty. The other provinces are governed by any person appointed by the Vali. Juanroo‡ is governed by one of the Vali's sons. We were shown to-day the Vali's private room. It was a handsome apartment. Round it were pictures of women. One was said to be the portrait of a female slave, sent as a present to one of the Vali's ancestors by Shah Abbas the Great. We entered the room rather before it was prepared for our reception ; and as it had only just been opened, we perceived a strong smell of liquor, and saw in the niches certain case bottles and decanters, which plainly showed that the Khan was not an overscrupulous Mussulman, and that this apartment was reserved for his secret pleasures.

* At two hours and a half farsakhs, S. of Sinna, is the river Garro, which forms, or rather is the principal stream of the Diala. It is formed by many springs, which join at a place in Hassanabad.

† Literally parishes.

‡ From Sinna to Juanroo the distance is eighteen farsakhs; from Sinna to Sakiz (the capital of the district) twenty-four farsakhs; Sinna to Avroman (the nearest part of the district), twelve farsakhs.

From some symptoms of Persian rapacity I thought I had perceived among the Vali's people at Sinna, I judged it would be better not to go to his camp as I had promised. I therefore imparted my intention of returning by the direct road to Sulimania, to my hosts, in the evening. This, as I expected, produced a remonstrance, which of course was fruitless. I saw they looked at each other very blank ; and after trying in vain to change my resolution, they all retired to Omar Aga's room, where a council was held, and several deputations were sent to intreat I would go to the Vali ; but I remained firm. I began to fear the attentions of the Khan would require a more considerable return than I could afford, and this made me resolute. Omar Aga came several times, then the Seid, then Ovanness* ; but to no purpose.

* Two of the native secretaries belonging to the Residency.

At last the whole council came to the door of the room where I was sitting, intreating, and even supplicating, that I would listen to them. They said that I little knew the Khan's vindictive character ; that nothing even I could say would persuade him but what they had done something to disgust me, and produce so sudden a change in my resolution ; and that he had dug up the roots of Mahommed Reshid Bey's family for less ; that if I persisted in refusing, Inayet ullah Bey and Mirza Feraj ullah said they would run away, and that they should be in Sulimania as quickly as I could, for that meeting the Khan would be quite out of the question.

I thought their distress might be affected, at least to so great a degree ; and I therefore still held out. I afterwards, however, began to relent, and sent to offer them a compromise, of sending my Persian secretary to camp to apologize for not going myself, and to express my satisfaction with their conduct. I was informed that they were really in tears, and that my offer gave them but little pleasure. They afterwards, as I have since learned, took a fal, or omen, from Hafiz, which encouraged them to make another attempt. In the meantime I began to think that their earnestness could not proceed wholly from affection, and I recollected some stories which I had heard of the implacability and cruelty of the Vali, especially in the instance of Mahommed Reshid Bey ; and I really began to fear these poor men might get into some scrape on my account. I therefore resolved on gratifying them, at all risk of inconvenience to myself. So that when they again came to the door to intreat, as a last favour, that I would defer my departure for a day, till they could inform their master of my change of plan, they found me prepared to grant more than they required; and I told them that I would, to oblige them, consent to go to the Khan. Their joy at this sudden revolution in my sentiments plainly showed me that their concern had not been affected. The discussion lasted till eleven at night; by which time I got so severe a headache that all rest was out of the question.

CHAPTER VIII.

Leave Sinna—Appearance of the Country—Tents of Gulaneh—The Koords great politicians—The Kizzel Ozan River—Encampments—A Peasant's remark—Lawless conduct of the Jafs—Precipitous Road—Refreshments of Honey and Butter—Arrival at the Village of Meek—Mrs. Rich taken on to another Village—Bee-hive—Rejoin Mrs. Rich—Present of Fruit from the Vali—Arrival at Bana—The Vali's Son—Fine Fruit.

August 30.—I ROSE unrefreshed at dawn, but determined to begin our journey. When I came to the outer court, I found Mirza Feraj ullah, who ran up to me, took me by the hand, and expressed his gratitude to me for having yielded to their solicitations, which had, he said, set him completely at ease. He accompanied me out of the town. My melmandar to camp is Abdullah Bey, the son of Inayet ullah Bey, who had been sent expressly for this purpose by the Vali. We proceeded first through the castle-gate, and then through that of the city walls, which reminded me of those of Bussora, and, like them, they are built of mud. I now find that the city has only one wall besides that of the fortified palace, and that all beyond it is suburb, which is pretty extensive. At a quarter before six in the morning we finally left the town. Abdullah Bey now told me the real causes of their distress last night. He said I could form but a faint notion of the suspicious and vindictive character of the Vali; that on hearing I had given up my idea of visiting him, he would reason thus :—" ' Here is a man whom both I and my neighbours have often in vain invited, yet he was coming out of his way purposely to see me of his own accord. This visit would have been talked of, and done me honour ; and possibly also he might have had business with me, or something to impart to me. These men at Sinna knew this, and have purposely done something to disgust him and send him back without seeing me ; they are not my well-wishers ; they may be in some plot against me.' You may readily imagine that such a train of reasoning " (added the young man) " would produce evil consequences for us."

Abdullah Bey informed me that the winter is much harder at Sinna than at Sulimania, and the summer much cooler. Immediately after leaving the town we rose, and continued gently ascending all the march. The country was open and tolerably well cultivated. The tops of the hills were broken and craggy ; sometimes so much so as to look like ruins. On the sides of the hill we still observed slate and gypsum. Many of the crags seemed strongly tinged with iron. Some of the stones were greenish with micaceous particles.

For some time we travelled in the bed of a torrent. About eight we saw on our left the large village and vineyards of Saru Kamish ; and soon after we began to ascend the heights of Allah u

Khoda, whose summit we reached by a gentle acclivity at a quarter to ten. This mountain joins the Bazir Khani range, and stretches away from Zagros, which we saw towering above all the other parallel ranges of mountains on our left. Before us were hills; also on our right, or in an E.S.E. direction. To the north-east of us were the plains of Ban Leilak in the distance, with the tops of some high mountains just appearing. Above us on all sides were craggy summits. We wound along the side of the mountain for some time, and at twenty minutes past ten began to descend by a very gentle declivity. This mountain runs north-east. About half past eleven we reached the large, but filthy village of Bayenko, situated in a valley at the bottom of the descent. It is in the province, or boluk, of Hassanabad; and here we joined the Tabreez road. Our general direction was due north,—our rate of travelling very good; except for one hour and a half, when we had considerable difficulty in making our way over some crumbling narrow paths which run along the precipitous sides of the mountains. Mrs. Rich left the town on horseback about dawn this morning, and only arrived an hour before us, owing to having taken a more circuitous route. Our stage to-day is called four farsakhs.

August 31.—We mounted at forty minutes past five. After winding for some time through a dell, as we advanced the country became more open.

The summits of the hills were still craggy ; and passing along the road we observed slate, some gypsum, and a little nitre. The soil was indifferent, and the cultivation poor and thin. We noticed many springs on first setting out. Ban Leilak, a district subject to Sinna, lay to the east of us, and had the appearance of a plain broken into hills, with a line of hills running through it. It is reckoned very cool during the hot season. Our road was very undulating, chiefly in a northerly direction. The air was delightful, reminding us of the climate of Bagdad in the month of December. At nine we passed, on our left, a flat artificial mount raised by Nadir Shah, who pitched his tent on it. He remained here forty days on account of the excellence of the air, during his campaign against Topal Osman, Pasha of Bagdad. At forty minutes past nine we arrived at the tents of the villagers of Gulaneh, who, like those of Berruder, encamp during the summer. The tents were situated close to the road, and not far from a hill called Taoushan Tepéh, from the quantity of hares always found here in winter. The Persians do not make use of the hawk in hunting the hare, as the Turks do, but course them with greyhounds.

We found a two-pole tent of the Vali's pitched for us, with a handsome carpet, the manufacture of Sinna, and nimmuds all round. Omar Aga, therefore, occupied the tent I had brought with me, and Abdullah Bey had his own.

The Koords are as great politicians as Englishmen. Omar Aga and Abdullah Bey talked nothing but politics the whole of the day's march.

Gulaneh, being a frontier village between the two provinces of Hassanabad and Kara'Tourow, frequently changes its masters, and the governor of either province who has most interest generally gets possession of it.

We now find that, in all likelihood, we shall have to go as far as Banna to reach the Vali. This was not communicated to me at first, for fear of my objecting to the distance. Banna is but a day or two out of our way; and as the journey there will give me an opportunity of seeing a new and very interesting part of Koordistan, I the less regret the delay. A visit to the caves of Kereftoo would cause us a detention of two days more, which I cannot consent to, all my people being ill of the fever. We are a complete walking hospital.

September 1.—We marched at half past five this morning, and directed our course north-west to the hilly tract on our left. We had several steep ascents and descents for the first hour, during which our rate of travelling was slow, but afterwards became very good. At five minutes before seven we reached a very steep descent to the Kizzel Ozan, a river of some geographical celebrity*. The source is about two farsahks off to the left or west, in the Abbas Bey mountains. It runs east, and goes hence to Meiandoav. I viewed the stream with the interest with which one sees all great or celebrated rivers in their infant state. There was not above a foot of water in it; but this is extraordinary, and proceeds from the uncommon drought of the season. It is generally up to the stirrups, and frequently unfordable for days together in the spring. The Vali proposes to build a bridge over it.

* The Kizzel Ozan is supposed by Major Rennell to be the Gozan of the Scriptures. See 2 Kings xvii. 6; and the following is his description of it in his "Inquiry concerning the Disposal

of the Ten Tribes of the Jews which were carried into Captivity to Nineveh." "This river springs from the country anciently named Matiene, between Tabreez and Hamadan, and, taking its course eastward, falls into the south-west part of the Caspian sea, penetrating in its way the great ridge of mountains that divides Media from the Caspian provinces. From the upper level of Media it descends with a rapid and furious course through a frightful chasm, which its waters have worn through the base of the mountains, which is many miles in width; when, having reached the lower country of Ghilan, it glides with a navigable course to the sea. Previous to its descent, it collects the waters of Abbar and Casbin, &c. under the name of Shah-rud, and the collective waters take the name of Isperrud, or the White River, perhaps from its long-continued foaming course through the mountains; for Della Valle says, 'that its waters themselves have a reddish tinge.' Travellers describe with horror the road which leads along the side of the chasm, and which is the only one practicable for loaded beasts from Ghilan to Ispahan. It is generally excavated from the steep rocky cliff which impends over the dreadful gulf below, and along it the traveller holds loosely the bridle of his beast while he leads him along, fearing to be drawn after him should a false step be made.—See Olearius, Hanway, &c. This chasm is about 180 miles to the westward of the Caspian sea."—Rennell's Geography of Herodotus, note, page 395.

Immediately after crossing the Kizzel Ozan we ascended again, and passed over a very broken tract of the same bare aspect as before. There were some very craggy summits around us. The country, for the most part, is uncultivated, and is usually the summer-pasture of the Sulimania tribes. From some vestiges of their camps, which we passed, I took occasion to inquire their mode of encampment. I found it was always in a circle, with their flocks* in the centre. This indeed is necessary for defence, as they are generally on bad terms with the people of the countries through which they wander, and their depredations render them very unwelcome guests.

We are now evidently at a great elevation above the sea. All this part seems to be a plateau intersected by ravines. It is prodigiously fertile in riwaz, of an excellent quality, especially in the stony places. This herb, which grows wild all over Koordistan and most parts of Persia, and which is in great request for sherbets, is, I believe, the garden rhubarb of which we make tarts in England.

We passed through a valley, which gradually narrowed into a rocky ravine, in which there was a great accumulation of fresh rain-water, that proved there had been a storm here last night. At half-past nine we ascended the extremity of the ravine, and descending again into a valley, reached the large village of Kelekowa in the district of Hobetoo. Large ricks of coarse hay were piled up for winter-consumption. The inhabitants were reaping the corn. The millet was yet quite green. Some Indian corn was ripe. The winter is said to be extremely hard in all this part of the country. The air was delightfully cool, and we might have ridden all day without any inconvenience from the sun.

* The fleeces of the flocks of Karatcholan are reckoned more productive: those of this part of the country finer and more silky.

We went on to the tents of the village, which were pitched at the termination of the valley, where we arrived at ten minutes past ten*.

The time of encampment is nearly over, and the people are about to return to the village. The temperature of a fine spring near our camp was 50°.

There are great quantities of the pink and white crocus in flower, growing all about, even in the middle of the road. On inquiring for some roots to take to Bagdad, the peasants brought us a number of bulbs of different kinds. The whole country, they say, is covered with flowers in the spring.

September 2.—Though it was extremely cold last night, I was devoured with sand-flies, which did not allow me to rest a moment. The air this morning was so sharp that I was glad to betake myself to my old sheepskin spencer. We mounted at six. The valley continues in a northerly direction, and through it runs the road to Sakiz and Tabreez; but our road lay over the hills which form the valley, in a northwest direction, in which we continued the whole of the day, though with some windings.

* This is still the Tabreez road, which we quit to-morrow.

A peasant, who was walking by us, looking about him to see that no Persian was within hearing, said to Omar Aga, "God bless the Kermanj*!" "And how do you like the Sinna men?" said Omar Aga. "The curse of God to them all," answered the man. "Hush! if they heard you, what would become of you?" "They could not treat me much worse than they do now," was the poor peasant's reply.

The country rose gradually, but very perceptibly, from the moment we left the village-tents. We found ourselves on a plateau, and surrounded by craggy summits, and lines of hills, terminating the plateau. One hill on our left adjoins Hajee Ahmed, which is about four farsahks distant, and hides it from our view. All the lines of hills appear to run north-east and south-west to Zagros. The winter here is intensely cold, and this road becomes then quite impassable from the snow. We saw traces of a recent heavy storm of rain, which is rather a phenomenon at this period, the rain generally commencing about the beginning of October, after which the snow very soon follows. The whole country is wild and uncultivated, being only used for summer-pasturage (aylak) by the tribes of Sulimania. At eight we began a very steep descent, which occupied about a quarter of an hour, into a narrow valley winding between high hills, in which we continued the rest of the march. We at length came to one or two miserable-looking villages and some patches of cultivation. The corn was just got in. We observed some stunted cotton plants and a small recinus, or castor-oil plant, nearly as stunted.

* The name of the Pasha of Sulimania's clan, to which Omar Aga belonged.—Ed.

Mrs. Rich, who generally sets off rather before me in the morning, got on but slowly to-day; and as we had nearly come up with her, we alighted at half past nine near a little spring, to allow of her getting clear of us*. We mounted again at ten, and continuing in the same narrow valley, at eleven we reached the village of Soormoosi. It is situated in the district of Khorkhoora, which we entered at the bottom of the steep descent or commencement of the valley. High up in the opposite hills, we remarked

* In compliance with eastern customs, as has already been mentioned, Mr. and Mrs. Rich travelled with separate establishments, which marched at different hours, and were always careful to keep at a distance from each other on the road, especially when Mr. Rich was accompanied by any men of rank of the country. His party on this occasion consisted of a mehmendar and his suite, besides the gentlemen, officers, and servants of the Residency. Mrs. Rich was accompanied by her female attendants, some guards, Aga Minas, and sometimes, though this was perhaps not quite according to rule, by the physician, Dr. Bell. However it may be here remarked, the Mahometans make a distinction, and tolerate a European lady's being attended by men of her own country and religion; but the unpardonable offence in their eyes is, her being seen unveiled by Mahometans, or in any way conspicuous, whether veiled or unveiled, on occasions of public ceremony.—Ed.

a little square fort, to which the peasants used to retire for security against the incursions of the Bulbassis. These incursions, however, have either diminished or wholly ceased ; the strength and spirit of that nation having been broken both by the Turks and Persians.

In the valley it was disagreeably hot when the wind was intercepted. During the course of our day's march I observed more gypsum than usual : slate as before, with some nitre and chalk. I believe I saw granite on some of the crags, but am not quite sure.

More people hereabouts wear the 'Turco-Koordish than the Persian dress. The women were all habited after the Persian fashion.

September 3.—We set out at six, and continued winding through the valley at rather a slow pace, until we struck over the hills which bound it on the S. side. The rest of our journey was at a pleasant pace, but we had much winding in the course of our march. Upon ascending the hill, we came to some wild pear-trees of a considerable size, which formed an agreeable sight after the bare country we had travelled over ever since we had left Sinna ; throughout which, except in gardens, we had seen nothing larger than a wild rose-bush, of which there are great quantities every where, and a stunted willow.

We wound round the mountains, on some of the highest parts of which the grass was still green and in flower. At half past seven we descended into a narrow glen, and then immediately rose again ; and at twenty minutes past eight we turned west, in which course we continued (winding considerably) the rest of the way. We soon after reached a little stream called the Khorkhoora river, much swollen by the late rain. The flush of waters had retired and left a quantity of fish dead in the mud*.

Hence we ascended up the sides of a rocky glen, and at ten arrived at the village of Kara Bokra, situated nearly at the top of the glen, where the summit of the mountain rises above it. Some poplar and fruit trees make the place look pleasant, but it is, as usual, a filthy village. On the opposite height of the glen are the remains of a fort, built as a place of refuge against the Bulbassis.

We saw one or two wretched villages to-day, but for the most part the country was very wild. We heard sad accounts of the lawless conduct of the Jafs, who pasture all over this district, but the bad government of the Vali has at least as much to do in the depopulation of the country as the incursions of the wild clans.

* This stream falls into the Kizzel Ozan ; it rises under a very considerable mountain on our left called Tchaltchemeh, which is a part of the Khosroo Khan chain of mountains, on the side of which, under the summit, is Kara Bokra, the village to which we are going. Sakiz is about N. W. of us, on the other side of the Khosroo Khan : the course of all the mountains is from S. W. to N. E., where most of them lose themselves in the plateau we have passed.

I noticed to-day schistus in horizontal laminæ, intersected with veins of gypsum, more frequent than before. Some of the gypsum was tinged of a beautiful red colour. I observed likewise much mica, especially towards the end of the stage.

We meant to have gone farther to-day, so as to have reached Banna to-morrow, but the Koords, who wished us to get on, seemed not quite clear respecting the distance ; and as the road was mountainous and fatiguing, I was resolved not to risk a long march with my poor sick people, and determined upon halting for the day at Kara Bokra. We found the day very warm in this close valley.

Sakiz, the capital of this district, is due north of us, and distant six hours by a very bad road, and seven by rather a better one. It is situated on the other side of the Khosroo Khan mountains*.

September 4.—We left the village of Kara Bokra at a quarter past six, and quitting the glen ascended the hill which forms the north side of it, to the fort, which we attained in ten minutes, by a steep but not bad road. We then wound among the tops of the hills. Bears abound in these hills, but are all of the common brown sort.

At five minutes past seven we began to descend by a good road. Upon reaching the bottom, we found ourselves in a narrow, rocky valley, or rather ravine among the hills, in which we continued the rest of the day, to our infinite trouble. The road continually ascended or descended along the steep sides of crumbling slate. The path was narrow and shelving, indeed it was nothing more than a sheep-path with a precipice on the left hand. The Koords even confessed it was the most disagreeable road they had ever travelled over, and for the first time, at a bad pass, I saw them dismount. Omar Aga's horse fell with him once, on the very edge of the precipice; he very adroitly threw himself off at the moment, without quitting the bridle, otherwise horse and man must have been killed. My head turned so much, that I was obliged to walk the whole way from the foot of the mountain, to the end of the march,—a severe effort, even for a person in health and used to walking. The day was also hot and disagreeable, and the eye was unrewarded by a single beautiful or agreeable prospect.

* From Kara Bokra to Serkhuan i Shelal, the capital of Teratul, is four hours ; thence to Beestan four hours.

From the mountain we saw Mount Kelli Khan, and Mount Zagros, or a part of it. We reached the foot of the mountain at thirty-five minutes past seven; and soon after came to a miserable little village, named Hajee Mahommed. Thence rising a little, we dropped at once on the village of Soota, by a most horrible break-neck descent, with a precipice on our left hand. Here we halted at half past eight, and refreshed ourselves with a cup of coffee. We imagined that our difficulties were nearly at an end, but we found afterwards that the worst was to come. At a quarter past nine we started again; and soon after, having descended and crossed the little stream which occupied the bottom of the ravine, we reached the little village of Seifatala, or the bitter apple, where we again stopped to rest. A kind of priest or man of the law, who seemed to be the proprietor of the village, set before us an ample meal of honey, fresh butter*, yoghourt†, cucumbers, and buttermilk.

Omar Aga and the Bey fell to voraciously at these rustic delicacies. I was too much heated to touch anything but a spoonful or two of the buttermilk.

At half past eleven we set off again over the same horrible road. The Khorkhoora, which still flowed in the bottom of the ravine, was fringed with willows; and now we came to some rather pretty lanes of stunted ash and poplar-trees, and gigantic wild rose-bushes.

At half past one I was so much exhausted, that I was obliged to rest myself under the willows by the stream, which was full of fish quite tame, none of the people hereabouts being fond of fish. At two we mounted, I may say marched, for I did not take to my horse the whole way on account of the precipices,

* The natives of this part of the East always eat honey and butter together, and it is likely to be a prevailing custom in other parts of the East, from the mention made of it in scripture—"Butter and honey shall he eat," Isaiah vii. 15.

† A preparation of milk.

which were too much for my weak head; and at twenty minutes to three we arrived at the village of Meek, quite exhausted. Here an additional mortification awaited me. Mrs. Rich with the baggage had been taken on to Bayendereh, a village up the valley, instead of turning to the right and stopping at Meek. I could not move, nor could Mrs. Rich, after such a day's journey, come back to join me; which I found after I had learnt where she had been carried to, and after having waited so long in the hopes of her coming to dinner that all appetite vanished, and was succeeded by a slight attack of fever. I had no linen to change, though all my clothes were wet with perspiration. In this emergency Omar Aga was most kind, and poor old Hajee Cossim* took the greatest care of me, sitting by my bed all night. Yet it was the first time these many years that that office had been performed by a servant or a stranger, and I could not but fancy myself not so comfortable.

Meek is in the district of Sakiz, which commenced at the little stream just before we reached Seifatala. The honey of all this part of the country is very famous, from the number of aromatic plants which grow hereabouts. Tired as I was, I went to see a bee-hive in a garden close by. The garden was prettily planted with flowers and aromatic herbs. It contained a cottage, or rather hut, built of wattles.

* One of Mr. Rich's servants.

On one side of it were inserted tubes of earthenware, or rather hardened mud, open at one end, with a small aperture at the other, or outwards. When they want to take the honey, they open the opposite side of the hut to that in which the tubes are inserted, and light a fire of straw, when the bees immediately escape through the small aperture into the air, leaving the honey at the disposal of the proprietor. They drew out one of the tubes, and showed me the bees at work on several combs. They were so intent on their occupation, that they did not assault the intruder.

We heard to-day the crowing of innumerable multitudes of partridges. In Avroman they are said to be still more abundant. Hundreds are taken by parties of sportsmen stationed on opposite hills, who frighten the covey by shouting as soon as it comes in their direction. The birds at last become alarmed and confused, and drop to the ground, when they are easily taken. Abdullah Bey assured me that, on one occasion, when he was out with the Vali on a hunting party of this sort in Avroman, upwards of a thousand partridges were taken.

Deer of several kinds, the wild goat, and I believe the elk, (for they call it the mountain-ox, as they do the deer the mountain sheep,) are very abundant. They are hunted in the winter. Antelopes are found in the province of Isfendabad.

September 5.—I was very ill all night, and this morning it was a question whether I could proceed to-day. I was resolved to make the attempt, and accordingly at seven we left Meek, and after mounting a hill by a very precipitous path, we wound round the summit of it, to the place from whence the descent to the village of Bayendereh commences. Here I found myself so very weak, that I could go no farther. In attempting to sit down, I fainted and fell; luckily Koord Oglou* was behind me, who received me in his arms. I now resolved, or rather this attack of weakness resolved for me, that I could proceed no farther than Bayendereh, the village where Mrs. Rich had taken up her quarters last night. My evil destiny, however, pursued me, and by some mistake, Mrs. Rich had marched on to another stage. When Omar Aga, who had ridden on, found this, he sent forward a horseman to bring the party to a halt at the nearest village after Bayendereh; and he came back to tell me the arrangement he had made. I went on therefore, or rather was carried by Koord Oglou and the farrier down the descent, and rested again under a willow by the side of a pretty stream. Here a cup of coffee was prepared, which I found reviving; and kind Omar Aga insisted on my swallowing a couple of spoonfuls of the universal Koordish remedy, airan, or butter milk, which he procured from the village of Bayendereh. This really refreshed me considerably, and at half past ten I found myself able to proceed the rest of the way, the road fortunately being easy.

* Mr. Rich's Imrahor or chief groom: he was a native of Bayazid in Armenia.—Ed.

We mounted therefore, and rode at a tolerable pace along a winding but more open valley, through which ran a stream prettily fringed with willows. At a quarter to twelve, without having ascended considerably, we reached the top of a very steep descent, I think the steepest we had yet met with; it occupied about half an hour, and is called Kelleh Balin. Both Omar Aga and Abdullah Bey agreed in saying it was a pass of Zagros. The two mountains here form a valley which reaches to Banna. Both are wooded with the dwarf oak.

From the foot of the descent we proceeded through a beautiful lane of dwarf oaks, ash, willow, and poplars, and at half past one arrived at the village of Surene, situated in a valley formed by two branches of Zagros*, a wretched place with an imposing name, where at last I rejoined Mrs. Rich, and enjoyed the breakfast she had prepared for me, not having taken any sustenance since the day before yesterday at dinner.

* The west branch seems to be the same hill we crossed laterally coming to the vale of Bayenderch. From the pass to the village it is about S. 70 W. It then turns off more southerly, and returns again to Banna. The three points which we saw from Ahmed Kulwan and Zeribar are about S. 50 W. from Surene; and Banna lies in N. 83 W.

A man from the Vali, who is at Banna, reached me here with some loads of fruit and a polite letter.

September 5.—We left Surene at six o'clock, and proceeded through the beautiful valley. At seven we passed on our right hand the village of Bjæ, or Bzhæ. Soon after the valley and mountains wound more southerly. We now saw the three points so often mentioned; and shortly after a pass opened through the mountains leading to Kizzeljee; then the mountains returned again; and at half past nine we arrived at our station at Ahmedava, as the Koords pronounce Ahmedabad, in the neighbourhood of Banna. It was a pleasant spot, situated on the Ard-baba hills, which is a part of the west or south chain of Zagros*, and about ten minutes' walk of a horse from Banna. There were some vineyards, and a pretty terrace, where the Sultan of Banna sometimes pitches a tent for recreation. Near a cool spring, was a remarkably fine willow, indeed I think the largest and finest I ever saw; the Vali had pitched a few tents for our reception; and we found his maître d'hôtel and some cooks ready to wait upon us.

In the afternoon a son of the Khan's, Hussein

* The mountain on the north side of the valley of Banna, which seems to be Zagros proper, the south and others being only ramifications, winds to N. 25 W.; where it seems to form an abrupt promontory, and disappears. That point is Bitwein, about thirteen hours off.

† The temperature of the spring was 53°.

Kouli Khan, came to welcome me to the place, accompanied by the Vizir and three other ministers or members of council ; one of whom, an old man, Mirza Abdul Kereem I think they called him, was the principal spokesman. The little Khan was a fine boy, of about twelve years of age. His countenance was very like that of the one at Sinna, but seemingly much more lively and intelligent. He behaved with great propriety, made his compliments with a good grace in Persian, and endeavoured to enter into conversation, by asking how far it was to England, how I liked Koordistan, if we smoked the kalioon in our country, &c. The rest of the conversation was carried on by the old men ; and, as it consisted chiefly of Persian compliments, it is not worth recording.

I received in the evening a large present of fruit from the Khan,—some peaches from Meiandaov, which, though not very fine, were acceptable, as being the first of the season. On these occasions the sculptures of Persepolis strongly present themselves to my mind. The introducer of the party, with a staff, precedes a long train of servants, each bearing some article, the present being as much as possible divided, to make the greater show. The Khan insists on our breakfast and dinner being prepared in his own kitchen. It is of course in the Persian taste, but I think better dressed than at Sinna, and they attend to our hours of comfort.

CHAPTER IX.

Visit to the Vali of Sinna—The Castle of Banna—Conversation of the Vali—Marriage of his Son—The Vali returns my visit—His cruelty at Banna—Preparations for our departure—Unexpected hindrances—Difficulty of obtaining Cattle—Vali's apologies—The Sultan of Banna—Begin our march—Village Chief—Refuses to allow us to proceed on our journey—Disagreeable situation—Determine to fight our way—The Chief alarmed—Allows us to proceed—Mountains—Enter the Bebbeh Territory—Omar Aga's retainers—Ruins of Karatcholan—Fine Fruit—Precipitous Hills—Arrival at Sulimania.

September 7.—THIS morning was fixed for my visit to the Khan. He had promised to receive me early on account of the heat, which I much dread being exposed to ; but it was half past ten before they came to say he was ready. We then rode into town : at the entrance of which we were received by Mirza Inayet ullah and a party of horse, who considerably increased the heat, and covered us with dust. On ascending the hill of the castle we found a street formed by riflemen from Sakiz and other mountain districts, and the Serbazes or regular troops, who received me with presented arms, and, by the way, did not look any better than those at Sinna. There were about a hundred and fifty of them. The castle, or palace, or whatever it may be called, is a wretched-looking place. The Khan was sitting in an unplastered talar, surrounded by a quantity of melons. He rose to receive me, and gave his hand to Mr. Bell and myself. I was much disappointed in his manners and appearance. I had expected to see the dignity and refinement of Daoud Pasha*; instead of which I found a plain, rough kind of Persian, and rather an oddity—something of what we should call a good fellow, with no dignity, and nothing remarkable in his conversation, which consisted entirely of abrupt questions and short remarks. In person he is above the middle size, has rather a short thick face, grizzly beard, and bushy black eyebrows, which, being straight and contracted, gave rather an unpleasing character to the upper part of his face. I must here observe that I never did see either a graceful or dignified Persian: indeed, their dress does not admit of the first; and rough, abrupt manners, with a loud voice, are now the fashion, in order to imitate the tribesmen and court party. I should call the Persians ruffian dandies.

With the Khan was sitting Musa Khan, the governor of Serdesht, now on a visit to the Vali; the Sultan of Sakiz, a favourite of Khan's, and the Sultan of Banna. Omar Aga seated himself on a line with them, and seemed perfectly free and unconcerned, much more so indeed than they did. He looked like a prince among them. The Khan's two sons stood outside the window at the head of a party of armed attendants. The favourite son, Mahommed Ali Khan, who is to be married to the King of Persia's daughter at the approaching feast of the Noorooz, is a coarse swarthy-looking boy, and resembles his father, which none of the others, whom I have seen, do. The Vali had on a black Cashmere shawl upper dress: he was otherwise plainly attired; nor had he any handsome arms or trinkets about him. A ship spyglass, an old lacquered cane with a silver head, and a plate containing a common watch, two or three silver-mounted seals, with a Birmingham opium-box, were all that ornamented his sadr or throne. He spoke to me in Turkish, which is the fashionable language now in Persia; but as I have already said, I recollect little worth recording. He merely asked short questions, and had a disagreeable trick of repeating insignificant things, and making you repeat them also. He asked how old I was; I told him thirty-three: he remarked in Koordish that I looked like forty. He then inquired about my illness, in a profusion of Oriental medical terms, with which he seemed to be quite familiar. He spoke of Malcolm in high terms, and told me that Malcolm had made him handsome presents. He asked what an English resident had to do in Bagdad, and afterwards, what was my salary. About fifty melons were then set before him: he pulled a little Birmingham knife out of his pocket, and tasted them all. Trays of sweetmeats were afterwards produced. He and I ate out of the same tray, and he insisted on breaking off bits and giving them to me. A constant succession of kalioons was kept up. He asked much about Bonaparte; inquired if he built caravanserais, and said he had a great name. I sat about two hours with him. At parting he rose, welcomed me again, and told me he would soon come to see me. He inquired particularly of the people, if I was satisfied with my treatment at Sinna, and if any one had misbehaved. From a sudden frown over his countenance, and the terror with which his servants look when it appears, I could well believe, if I had known nothing else, that he is a formidable master. Indeed, all I hear of him proves him to be a most rapacious, vindictive, cruel man. The bastinado is going on every day at Banna, and great sums of money have been already extorted. There was a rebellion here last winter, which they say is the reason of these acts of severity.

* The Pasha of Bagdad.

Banna is a wretched, filthy place, scarcely deserving the name of town *. It is not much better than the villages we have passed through, only a little larger. The amaret or castle stands on a little artificial mount. Banna is properly the name of the district, Berozeh being that of the town; the latter appellation, however, is not commonly used. There are many Jews residing here.

* Sakiz is said to be a larger and better built place.

September 8.—Musa Khan of Serdesht came to see me this morning. He spoke much of the English at Tabreez. It is really delightful to hear the manner in which our countrymen in Persia are spoken of by every one.

In the evening the Vali came to pay his visit. He was preceded by his Serbazes, and followed by a considerable number of horse. The procession was not so showy as a Turkish one would have been. There is something mean and dismal-looking in the Persian costume, especially en masse. The Khan was more plainly dressed than yesterday; and had over him a dervish's coarse woollen robe. He was received at the tent door by the Serbazes with presented arms, and "God save the King," on the drums and fifes. The Khan of Serdesht, the Sultans of Banna and Sakiz, accompanied him. He showed me various arms; asked me if they were English or French; what was their value, &c. He told me the King of Persia had promised him three field-pieces, with artillerymen to drill a party of his own. "And I will learn myself, you'll see;—I will become as good a toptchee * as an Englishman—that I will. You know the battlements of the palace at Sinna? I will have a gun planted there, and place some bullocks and sheep on the opposite hill. You'll see how many I will kill every day." He now became quite cordial ; the conversation was indeed not very interesting in point of information, but it was quite unrestrained, He turned to Musa Khan, and said in Koordish, " Walla, I have taken to this man." He then said to me, " Will you be my brother ? It is good to have such a friend as I am ; I am a rich fellow." My library was mentioned. Omar Agar adroitly took the opportunity of letting him know I wanted the famous History of Koordistan, called the Tarikh al Akrad. He was in high good-humour. " Do you want the Tarikh al Akrad ? Walla, you shall have it." This book I have been in search of for many years. It would alone have been worth a journey to Sinna to obtain*.

* An artilleryman.

He has apparently latterly taken a religious turn. He was perpetually praying and ejaculating, and said he intended to make the pilgrimage to Mecca. At one time he inquired the hour, and on being informed, he took a small pill of opium and a sugar-plum after it ; and a great number of kalioons were smoked. I mentioned to him my wish to march to-morrow. He requested me to stay till the next day, that he might see me again. He came at four o'clock and stayed till near dark, when he took his leave in a very cordial manner. He was mounted on a steady large road-horse, on a pack-saddle covered with velvet. His servants quite started when he turned round suddenly, or spoke to any of them.

* Mr. Rich succeeded in getting this History of the Koords, but I do not remember from whom ; and it is now in the British Museum, with the rest of his library of Oriental books.—Ed.

September 9.—I was to have called on the Vali to-day to take leave of him. I told him to fix any time when he had no business, as it was quite equal to me when I went; and he said he would let me know. All the morning he was busy settling accounts with Banna. He pulled out the eyes of three of the principal men of this part of the country; and sent off their wives and daughters, with those of some other considerable persons, to Sinna. We saw the long train of women mounted on horses marching across the plain, escorted by some of the Khan's people, who rode among the women. This was the occupation of his morning, which fortunately only begins at eleven o'clock. The more we hear of him, the more disgusted are we with this monster. In the afternoon he rode out to inspect a village which he had seized. Before he went out he sent me word that unavoidable business had detained him all day, but that to-morrow he hoped to take leave of me, when he would march in one direction and I in another. This prospect of a late march annoyed me much, and I sent to make excuses, but he was then gone out, and did not come back till late at night.

About eleven I went to bed, and had not long deposited myself therein, when the Ferosh Bashi* came to say he had orders to strike my tents immediately. I was amazed at this sudden rudeness, which neither I nor Omar Aga, who came to inform me of it, knew what to make of. One thing I was resolved, that the tent should not be struck unless superior force were employed; and I requested Omar Aga, late as it was, to ride into town to the Vali, and demand an explanation of this extraordinary order. He complied; and in about half an hour sent back his mulla, (Fakih Kader, a most excellent fellow, par parenthese,) to tell me that it was all a mistake; that the Mirzas had requested him not to complain to the Khan, and that the Ferosh Bashi was in great alarm, and said that if the Khan knew it he would pull his eyes out. Omar Aga further represented, that in consequence of this he had not seen the Vali, and that he would wait in town to bring out our mules (which the Vali was to provide, as none could possibly be got but by his order) early in the morning, that we might march. I saw well that the affair had been hushed up; and as I could not imagine any intended insult, I concluded the order had been given in a fit of intoxication, as, besides opium, the Khan liberally uses the juice of the grape, and, as may be easily imagined, at such moments is a perfect brute. This disagreeable affair kept me up till two in the morning*.

* Head of the tent-pitchers.

* Last night my poor groom, Hussein, died. He had given himself up from the moment he had been attacked, soon after leaving Sinna. He was a fine young man. Hassan, a tent-pitcher, is also dead at a village where I was obliged to leave him; and a groom is dead at Sulimania.

September 10.—We rose with the sun, but no mules appeared. Omar Aga, who had returned from the town, told me they were coming, but that nine of the number were taken from a caravan which was passing through Banna from Bagdad to Georgia, and which I had yesterday cleared from double duties and certain other extortions the Khan's people had intended to impose on it.

The usual breakfast was preparing for us, after eating which the Khan would expect to see me, to take leave. The Vakil Kharj, or the maitre d'hôtel of the Khan, and Abdulla Bey, were the parties by whom all this was communicated to me. I was indignant. I said that I would not have the caravan mules (which I ordered to be given back to the owner, and afterwards saw that the order was executed); that I would march myself, and leave my baggage on the ground, and that I would on no account see the Khan. Abdullah Bey and some of the Khan's people immediately galloped off to town. The caravan man kept close to me with his mules, which had just been brought to our camp. The Vakil Kharj made haste to serve up his breakfast, hoping thereby to conciliate me, though I was not angry with him, for he was very civil and attentive. Omar Aga got ready three or four pack-horses, which he had collected from different quarters, to load the most necessary and important articles and file off. My saddle-bags, with the sextant, were the first things he thought of. All was bustle and stir.

When the few things that could be loaded were got off, Mrs. Rich and Mr. Bell mounted, accompanied by one or two of the sick people of our party and a trusty man of Omar Aga's, a clansman and cousin of his own, armed with my rifle and grotesquely accoutred with a broadsword of mine, the broad buff belt with its shining plate being swung over his shoulder. He was the commander of the party, and would have made a fine figure at the head of a party of banditti.

About half an hour after I had dispatched the party, Abdullah Bey came back, full gallop, to say that the Vali had just risen, and heard that I was detained for want of animals, that he had ordered his own horse to be given me for this service, that he was exceedingly concerned that anything unpleasant should have happened, requested that as my road lay through the town, I would take a cup of coffee with him in the way, and that I would further honour him by accepting a road-horse or ambling hackney, in token that I was satisfied with him. I was as well pleased that things were to pass off amicably, and accordingly, after having distributed money among (but not satisfied, for that was out of the question) the crowd of harpies which beset me, I rode into the town to take leave of the Khan. I found him very busy, dictating a letter to a mirza, who was sitting on his knees before him and writing just what the Khan told him, though I am confident it would not be what the mirza would have written had he been left to himself*.

The Khan received me very civilly, and even courteously, in his odd way. A small common opera-glass was lying before him. He said it was a present from the prime minister of the Shah; desired me to look through it, and asked what it might be worth. He wondered why it did not magnify as much as a larger one; and said, since they had bestowed such pains on making it, he thought they might have made it as powerful as a telescope. The Sultan of Banna, Noorullah Sultan, came in, and sat down at a distance. The Khan introduced him to me, and added "That he was a good boy †" (this good boy had a stiff black beard, about a foot in length, and seemed in evident terror of his panegyrist); "that he had made him, the Vali, a present of a village" (i. e. the village which the Vali had just appropriated), "where he meant to plant a garden that should exceed the Khosrooabad, and bring people from Mousul, Aleppo, and Cairo to look at it." Sweetmeats were now served up. The Khan asked me what he should send me as a present. I told him that the book he had promised me would be the most acceptable of all presents. He assured me I should have it; that he never told a lie, and would therefore confess that two copies were then in his possession, but that he wanted to compare them, and would infallibly send me one by an express from Sinna, to whom I should give a few canisters of gunpowder in return. He then asked me again what he should send me, and importuned me much. Finding myself closely pressed, I told him if at any time he found a book that he thought I should like, I should be obliged to him for it. This did not satisfy him: he insisted upon my specifying some book. I told him that when I returned home I would see what books were wanting, and let him know. He said he would make a bargain with me; he would write to me to send him what he wanted, and I should do the same. After about an hour's sitting I took my leave. He rose, shook hands with me, and made many compliments, insisting on knowing if I was perfectly satisfied with him. He marches from Banna to-day, on his return towards Sinna, to the great joy of the poor inhabitants of this place.

* The style of speaking and writing in the East are so very unlike, that Mr. Rich means to say, had the Khan given the mirza the substance of what he wished written, he would have expressed it very differently.—Ed.

† Yakshee Oghlan.

We left Banna at half past twelve, and crossing the plain in a north-west direction, entered a narrow valley, the hills above which were wooded with dwarf oak. We continued in this valley until forty-five minutes past one, when, ascending a little ridge of hills off the road, we reached at two the small, poor village of Swearwea, where we halted. I found we had done enough for the first day's stage, as we had set out late, and it was the fever day with most of the people. Abdullah Bey had intended to have accompanied me thus far, but thought he might be more useful if he stayed behind, to forward the remainder of the baggage, and also to get off the poor Caravanjee, whom I had protected, safe and sound. I therefore took leave of him at Banna, and he is the only person I regret in this territory. He is a fine, obliging, good-humoured young man.

A lad walked by my horse from Banna to this village. I asked him what was his trade; he said a shoemaker. I was curious to know what he might pay a year to government. He said his kharj or tax was one toman every fifteen days; but that since the Khan had been at Banna his family had paid five tomans; that he was consequently near starving, his trade not bringing him enough to answer this heavy demand.

September 11. — Last night some thieves got among us, and carried off two sets of silver horse furniture and some silver-mounted arms. As soon as I was informed of it, I sent off one of my own people, Ali Aga, and Fakih Kader, one of Omar Aga's followers, to Amanullah Khan, to inform him of the robbery, and request him to discover the thieves and procure restitution.

At half past seven we left Swearwea, and returning into our yesterday's road we proceeded in a northwest direction through the valley until nine, when we reached a fine vale which opened into it; and striking out of our road, we came at half past nine to the village of Nweizhgeh, situated on the hill that bounds the vale on the west. Our road to-day was mostly level and well wooded, principally with the dwarf oak and wild pear. The country was slaty and gypsous. We are still in the territory of Banna, which, by the bye, is a celebrated place for thieves. As the cattle we got at that place are very indifferent—a considerable portion are jackasses—we could get no farther than Nweizhgeh* to-day, there being no other village on our road between this and Merweh, four hours off, in the territory of our friends the Bebbels.

September 12.—Ahmed Bey, the chief of the village, a very unprepossessing-looking fellow, was much inclined to be disagreeable. We found this morning that he would neither supply us with cattle nor allow us to take those we brought with us, for which he said he had the Sultan of Banna's order. This did not appear to be improbable, as from a note sent me by the Sultan (with whose conduct in other respects I had every reason to be displeased), it was evident he was inclined to take part with a man whom we had arrested upon very strong suspicions of his being concerned with the thieves.

* Nweizhgeh means the place of prayers: namazga, or nweizh, or nuezh, is prayer, in Koordish, and evidently a corruption from the Persian word namuz.

We therefore found ourselves in a disagreeable situation. Aman ullah Khan had marched, and the only authority to whom we could look for assistance against the insolence of this chief seemed more disposed to support him than help us. The village could turn out thirty or forty musketeers, and was strongly situated. Our party, small in itself and all horsemen, was much weakened by sickness, so that we could not redress ourselves. I now began to regret having sent the Sepoys back to Sulimania, the sight of whom would soon have set matters right. Omar Aga and I held a consultation on what was to be done on the present emergency, and it was decided that we should leave our baggage and tents on the ground, march ourselves to the Bebbeh frontier, and thence send a party of Shinki fusiliers (a brave highland clan close by, in the Bebbeh territory) to the rescue of our baggage. Mrs. Rich was in the mean time marched off, under the care of Mr. Bell, with Mahommed Reza Tchaoush and some of the servants, all well mounted and armed. Omar Aga and I remained behind in charge of the sick, and ready to resist any attack that might be made on us. Ahmed Bey, however, did not seem to like our mien nor our consultation, for he soon came and said he would bring us as many asses as we wanted.

An agreement was made, and after great difficulties and delays, much swearing on their part and menaces on ours, the cattle were at last produced. We loaded the baggage, mounted the sick, and saw them fairly on the road, before we set off. From the general conduct of these people, and from something they let fall at parting, Omar Aga was apprehensive of an attack on the road. This we were determined of course to resist; and I felt quite sure we were their match in the fair field, being all well mounted and armed. We therefore formed in the best way we could for the protection of the baggage, the sick, and the helpless of our party, and adhered strictly to it till we saw them safely over the frontier.

The chief of Nweizhgeh seems to have thought it more prudent to allow us to leave his dominions unmolested, for we saw no more of him or his people*.

We marched at half past seven, and proceeded slowly to the road we had quitted yesterday, which we reached at eight. We soon after began to ascend by a good road, through a forest of dwarf oak of considerable size, of wild pear, and a tree like the hawthorn, producing a fruit which was not ill flavoured. We halted twice during our progress up the mountain we were now crossing which is called Bloo, and runs nearly north and south; but the ascent from the plain of Banna is so very gradual, that it makes no appearance on that side. On our left, at no great distance, lay the Soorkeoo mountain, rising very abruptly and running off in a south-east direction, the end nearest us being cut down by the water of Banna, and some other streams. But it is evidently a part of the chain in which we were travelling; and it is also, I believe, the same mountain that bounds the plain of Ahmed Kulwan, and which we crossed in going from Sulimania to that place by the road called the "Tariler Yoli." After resting ourselves and animals on the summit of Mount Bloo, we proceeded at half past ten. On the right and left of us was a sea of mountains, some running in lines, some broken and confused in such a manner that it was quite impossible to make out their plan. The country seemed to abound in slate, gypsum, and flint.

* The Sultan of Banna afterwards sent in Ahmed Bey, the chief of Nweizhgeh, as a prisoner to me at Sulimania, to punish him as I thought proper. I of course pardoned and sent him back.

We soon reached the top of the descent by which we entered the Bebbeh territory. Here a magnificent sight presented itself. The road led at once down into a deep and narrow valley which the eye could not fathom; on the opposite side, the country rose again to a height even greater than that on which we stood, and was crowned by two summits*, united by a curtain, the northern of which was a singularlyshaped hill, which we had noticed from Swearwea. The aspect of the country was enchanting. It was richly wooded, with many villages and patches of cultivation, as verdant as an emerald, in the most picturesque situations. The lines and forms of the mountains were broken in the most beautiful manner. The predominant tint of the soil was a deep red, varied with copper, green, and amethyst colour where the sides of the hills had been scathed by torrents or avalanches of soil. Our descent occupied about two hours, with very little interruption, through fine woods. It was very steep, but the road by no means so bad as one might have expected in so very mountainous a country. Certainly, nothing could be more marked than the difference between our Koordistan and Persia viewed from this spot. The very soil seemed to have changed its nature and tint—everything was a mixture of the grand and beautiful. We arrived at the bottom of the descent at half-past twelve, and crossed the Ber-rozeh or Banna water, which is joined here by other mountain-streams. This stream separates Persia from Turkey. It runs north and a little west, and falls into the Altoon Soo above the Karatcholan water*.

* These summits are in the district of Siwell.

I was heartily glad to get out of the land of trouble and beggars to that of real hospitality, and I felt myself quite at home again. We ascended, and rode along the side of the opposite height, and we observed, wherever the banks were cut down by the waters, layers of stone, each two or three inches thick, curiously twisted and involved, like a piece of old-fashioned fillagree work.

* The Karatcholan water joins the Altoon Soo near Shinek.

At a quarter to two we arrived at the village of Merwa, in the district of Aalan. Here we were welcomed by real Koords, and might hope to enjoy some comfort. The village is beautifully situated on the side of the mountain, at no very great elevation above the river, on the opposite side of which we saw the Bloo mountain running north and a little west. It there forms a magnificent precipice of bare rock called the Bree, a cleft in which, north of the village, opens into another fine rocky scene. Beyond the cleft it increases in height, and under it was visible the town of Beytoosh, in a north-west direction, which is three hours off—not in real distance, but from the difficulty of the road. On the face of the mountain, opposite to Beytoosh, is the district of Pizhder. To the west of us is a line of hills called Koorkoor, apparently running to join that I have just described. On this side of it is Shinek, five hours off. Adjoining Shinek, on the right hand or north, is Ghellaleh. On the other side of the line is Mergel, separated by a river from Bitwein, which is about ten hours off.

A great quantity of tobacco is grown in the neighbourhood of Merwa, the leaves of which the villagers were now drying on skewers and lines. I tried it, and found it very tolerable in its quality. Maash, a kind of vetch or gram, is cultivated hereabouts in abundance, and makes beautifully green patches among the hills. The wild vine is peculiarly luxuriant, and forms itself into tasteful draperies.

September 13.—We set off at seven, and immediately commenced ascending the hill, towards the curious-shaped summit noticed before, and which is called Gimmo. These mountains abound in springs, many of which are taken advantage of by the cultivator, and conducted in little trenches round the sides of the hills, to be let down over the sloping lands as occasion requires.

At a quarter past eight we reached the beautiful village of Deira, embosomed in a wood of the finest walnut-trees I ever saw, which had a prodigious spread. Gardens, vineyards, and cultivation surrounded the village in every available spot on the sides of the mountain. The vines in many places crept up the trees and extended from one tree to the other, forming festoons and draperies. Multitudes of springs burst from the sides of the hill and dashed over the roots of the trees in numberless little cascades. Nothing was heard but the murmuring of the waters.

It was not easy to pass so beautiful a spot without a pause to enjoy its loveliness. Accordingly, Omar Aga and I alighted under the shade of a walnut, by the side of a little rill, and the peasants immediately spread before us a collation of honey in the comb, fresh butter, buttermilk, peaches and grapes.

We loitered here till ten minutes past nine, and then quitted this lovely spot with regret. We still continued ascending, and in about half an hour reached the highest part, which was very Alpine in its appearance. Innumerable springs started from the ground. Those on the one side ran down in a northerly direction to the Berozeh water, while a little farther on they escape down towards the south, and join the Shinek water. There were no trees to be seen; but the ground was very verdant from the quantity of water. This spot is called Hazir Kanian, or the thousand springs. We had here attained the highest part of our road; but still, at a considerable height above us, were Gimmo and its fellow summit, both bare and stony. We continued for some time travelling under them. No road could have been better chosen to give me a correct notion of the chains and connexions of the mountains. Parallel with us was the Soorkeoo range, which, as I suspected, forms the Kizzeljee or Tariler mountain. It sends forth a branch, which sweeps round from the Serseer mountain, and then joins or forms that on which we now are. Behind, or south of this, is the Kurree Kazhav, running about south-east towards the Tariler. The country between is composed of broken hills, ascending to either range respectively. Villages and verdant patches on platforms, and sometimes as it were suspended on the sides of the mountain, diversify the scene. We could not go a hundred yards without coming to a spring of water, so cold as to make the teeth ache when drunk. The country presented appearances of copper and sulphur. The road, as usual, was well wooded, and though loose and stony, was by no means bad for so mountainous a tract.

Soon after my horse cast a shoe, and I could not proceed any farther on so stony a road with so valuable an animal till the damage was repaired. We had just given leave to the farrier to visit his sweetheart, who lived in a neighbouring village, and had mounted and equipped him quite smart for the purpose. Omar Aga, however, procured the necessary tools, and performed the operation himself, saying he "would not give a farthing for a soldier who could not shoe his own horse." This detained us some time, and it was two o'clock before we arrived at the village of Kenaroo in the district of Siwell*.

September 14.—Several of Omar Aga's retainers joined him last night from Sulimania. He tells me he has in all above forty in his service, of whom only three or four are not clansmen. He added, that it would never do for him to keep the citizen or peasant caste in his service. "They never grow much attached, nor will they stand by you in any difficulties. The clansman, on the contrary, though not of your own clan, grows warmly attached to you; and then neither hunger, thirst, poverty, fatigue, nor danger, ever affect him or separate him from you." By Omar Aga's men I was glad to hear of the convalescence of my party at Sulimania.

* Serseer was due south of us, distant about one mile. Our road to-day was along the ridge of the Siwell mountain.

At half past six we mounted. Our road was due south, descending down a glen to the foot of Serseer. We afterwards quitted the glen, and crossed the continuation of the chain of yesterday, where it joins the Serseer. We then descended to the Siwell river *, which runs by the foot of Serseer, then turns north a little west, and joins the Karatcholan at Mawutt; after which they both run to the Altoon Soo. At the place where we crossed it, the water was up to the stirrup for a few paces, and then it became shallow. It was about twelve or fifteen yards over; but the bed is much broader. In winter it is frequently unfordable, and is passed on kelleks, or rafts.

The country had now become chalky. We descended into the plain of Shehribazar; and soon after recognized our old friend Mount Goodroon, and the Giozheh hills, bare and regular, extending like a rampart as far as the eye could reach. We have now got into the country of sandstone and conglomeration; the wood diminishing, and almost disappearing, except in particular spots. At twenty minutes to nine we descended into a deep valley or ravine, formed by the Karatcholan river*, and proceeded to the spot where the town of Karatcholan, the old capital of this part of Koordistan, was situated. The town was in this ravine, the Koords seeming to prefer such low and close situations for their towns and villages. There are now no remains of the town; but a few wretched huts of peasants occupy the spot. We alighted at Sulimanava or Suliman Abad, a garden now in decay, planted by Suliman Bebbeh, the celebrated ancestor of the Bebbeh family. This valley is much celebrated for producing fine fruit, especially grapes and water-melons. All the fruit of Sulimania is brought from this place.

* The Siwell river is formed by the Kizzeljee and Beestan streams, and runs by the north side of Serseer.

September 15.—We mounted at ten minutes past six; and all our party were in high spirits at the prospect of reaching Sulimania in a few hours. I felt something like the elevation of spirits of a man returning to his own house ; and indeed, the kindness and hospitality I have experienced at Sulimania are well calculated to make me esteem it a kind of home.

* The Karatcholan river is the same as the Tenguzee, which is formed in the direction of Dolidreizh, and runs through the Kurree Kazhav mountains. The bed of the Karatcholan river is half a mile wide, but at this season the stream is low, as it is drawn off into many streams for the melon-grounds and cultivation. Just opposite the site of the city of the same name, it receives the Tchungura water which comes from Surotchik. In winter and spring the Karatcholan river is very considerable, and frequently fills the whole of its bed. Some way farther down there was a bridge over it, formed by wicker-work thrown over stone piers: this was carried away last winter.

Our road, after leaving the valley or hollow bed of the Karatcholan water, ascended gently the whole of the way. It was crossed by a deep ravine formed by a torrent now dry ; and the earth and crumbling sandstone had been broken and undermined, and had slid down in various confused and ruinous heaps*.

At half past seven we reached the foot of Mount Azmir, and soon after began to ascend the steepest part of it, by a very tolerable road, which zigzagged up the face of the hill without any precipice. At eight we arrived at the summit ; and after going south for about five minutes along the top of the hill, we began to descend. The first part of the descent was not bad ; but afterwards, for some little time, it was along the edge of a precipice ; and at one place where the road was out of repair, it was rendered really dangerous by a promontory of rock jutting out, which we were obliged to scramble over. Every one dismounted, and left his animal to make his way over by himself, which they did very slowly, deliberately, and carefully. This was soon passed ; and at half past eight we reached the bottom of the principal descent, and proceeded still south, and gently descending through a narrow valley, formed by the mountain on one side, and a screen branching out from and parallel with it on the other; till at ten minutes before nine we passed through an opening in the screen into the plain of Sulimania, on which we emerged at nine. Hence Sulimania bore S. 20 W. At ten we arrived at our tents at the Pasha's garden, the 'Tcharbaugh.

* I observed chalk in the course of this day's journey.

I have thus finished a journey which, though rendered unpleasant by the sickness of my people, has been completed, thank God! with less suffering than might have been expected, considering the severe fever to which we had been subjected, and the delicate constitutions and timidity of the natives of Bagdad, of whom my household was principally composed. It has been productive of much advantage. I have inspected a most curious and interesting part of Koordistan; scarcely any point of which was known previous to my visit, and which is not likely to be soon visited again by any traveller. And the routes I pursued, which often depended on mere accident, or the impulse of the moment, fortunately always turned out to be the best for giving me a general idea of the country, and the very ones I should have chosen to survey it, had I previously known enough to form a general plan of proceedings.

CHAPTER X.

Failure of Vaccination—Death of Osman Bey's Son—Sorrow of the Pasha—Antiquities of Shehrizoor—Alexander the Great and the Indian Princess—Names of districts—Omar Aga—His persecutions and imprisonment—Attachment of his Followers—His disinterestedness—His dislike of Osman Bey—Rahmet ullah Tartar—His journey through the wild and inaccessible Mountains inhabited by the Chaldean Christian Tribes—Amadia—The Pasha's advice to the Tartar—His difficulties and dangers—Chaldean Cantonment—Rice-bread—Astonishment of the Chaldeans at the sight of Rahmet ullah—Their contempt for Mahommed—Yezids—Van—Names of Koordish Clans—Wedding feast—Ladies dancing—Condition of the Koordish Women—A Koordish Marfisa—Dress of the Men—Tale of Darishmana—A Bebbeh Patriarch.

September 23.—ON my arrival here I was very much mortified to find that all Mrs. Rich's plans for the introduction of vaccination have failed, owing to the ignorance and presumption of the person who undertook to carry them into execution. The matter was evidently spurious, the eruption imperfect; and all the children vaccinated by him have, with only one or two exceptions, caught the small-pox. The second son of Osman Bey, a beautiful infant of a year and a half old, was among the number, and died yesterday.

I went this morning to pay a visit of condolence to the Pasha and Osman Bey. I found the former much affected; he with difficulty repressed his tears answered my compliments with a faltering voice, and once or twice returned to the subject of his poor little nephew with great tenderness. We gradually got upon other topics, and the old one, the antiquities of this country, was resumed. My inquiries after the site of the ancient city of Shehrizoor has set many Koords thinking on the subject. The Pasha gave it as his opinion to-day that it was situated at Kiz Kalassi, near Bistanzoor, in the province of Shehrizoor. There are still extensive ruins, or rather vestiges of ruins at Kiz Kalassi, which is about two hours from Arbet, and five from Sulimania, and from the ruins of which lime is still brought. The people here pretend that Kiz Kalassi was built by Alexander the Great, for a princess of India whom he had brought with him on his return from his Indian expedition; and who, falling sick, was recommended by her physicians to retire to a place whose climate should resemble that of her native country. The plain of Shehrizoor was selected for this purpose. Yaseen Tepeh, and Gevra Kalaa, or the great castle, are other ruins in that district; also a place called Dezkerra. In short, the district of Shehrizoor, and indeed all this part of Koordistan, abounds in vestiges of antiquity, though none of them are remarkable in themselves as ruins.

About an hour and a half from Sulimania, under the opposite line of hills, is Hazar Mird,—a place which, tradition says, was held out long against the first Mahometan invaders by the fire-worshippers, or, as the Koords call them, the Majouséan, and was the scene of a severe conflict. All along the tops of these hills vestiges of fortifications are said to be visible at intervals.

I propose to myself a visit to Shehrizoor, as soon as the weather grows cooler.

I had to-day a striking instance of the difficulty of procuring correct information from natives of the East, even those most remarkable for their intelligence and probity ; and I had an additional proof of the manner in which travellers may innocently commit the grossest blunders. The Pasha had once himself distinctly informed me that the name of his own clan was Kermanj. He now told me that this was not the case, and that Kermanj was the collective appellation of all the Bebbeh Koords*, and that his particular clan was named Bebbeh. Neither he nor any one present could tell me the meaning of the appellation Kermanj, nor whence it was derived. A gentleman present, who I believe was one of the family, said that the Bebbeh family was a branch of the Sekkir clan, and that the Shinkis and Ghellalis were related to them. The Bebbeh family has chiefly rendered itself remarkable since the extinction of the ancient house of Soran, not two hundred years ago, of which I spoke before†. They first descended from

* See Note, p. 81.

† See p. 81.

Mount Pizhder, conquered Mergeh, Mawutt, and Kizzeljee from the Persians, and Zengeneh from a particular family, a part of which is now existing at Kermanshah, who, though they speak Koordish, are not accounted real Koords; possibly the family was of the peasant race.

On quitting the Pasha, I went to see Osman Bey, who received my condolence upon the death of his son with the usual cut and dried phrases:—"It is the will of God, we cannot help it; God preserve the Pasha and you!" In a short time he began chatting and laughing as usual, looked at some horses, and then had some marble brought him, to choose pieces for the ornaments of his new kiosk, making me remark that it was marble from the Karadagh.

All the people of Sulimania complain of the extraordinary prevalence of the Sherki, or easterly wind, this year, which renders this season intolerably hot and relaxing. They have not had three days together free from this wind since the beginning of the summer*. Since we have returned from the mountains we have been greatly troubled with it, and it is still very relaxing, though divested of its extraordinary heat. I have several times, during these few days past, observed the partial nature of this current of air. It has been blowing almost a hurricane in a straight current over Sulimania, while a couple of hundred yards off at our tents we had only a slight breeze ; nay, I have seen it blowing all round my tent, while the tent itself remained unmoved in a perfect calm. The other night, while it was blowing a strong sherki here, Aga Minas had occasion to go across the plain to the opposite mountains. As soon as he crossed the Tanjeroo river he lost this wind, which he met again at the same place on his return.

* See page 125, and note.

September 28.—I procured from Omar Aga a list*, which is given below, of all the districts of this part of Koordistan, commencing from the Bagdad frontier.

* Daouda ; it commences four hours from Kifri. Dillo ; Zenganeh ; Kuom ; Zun, or Zend ; so called from the people who inhabit the district. Sheikhan ; Nura and Tchemtchemal ; Tchia Souz, i.e. the Green Mount ; Kewatchemala ; Shuan ; Tchubook Kalaa ; Esker ; Kalaa Sewka ; Gird Khaber ; Bazian. This finishes the outer line to Sulimania.

We now return to Karadagh, which is bounded by Dillo and Zenganeh on the west and north. On the south it goes to the Diala. The pass of Banikhilan on the Diala is in Karadagh. Karadagh is a large government, and is subdivided into several districts ; that in which Banikhilan is situated is called Dizziaieesh, in which is also Gewrakalaa.

Warmawa ; Sertchinar, in which is Sulimania. Soordash ; Mount Goodroon is in this district. Mergeh ; Pizhder. Between Mergeh and Pizhder flows the river of Altoon Kiupri, whose source is at Lajan, four or five hours west of Saouk Boolak. Ghellala ; Shinck ; Mawutt ; Aalan ; Siwell ; Seraou Mirawa ; bounded by Mawutt, Siwell, and Aalan. Balukh Gapiron ; Sheherbazar ; Berkeou ; Serotchik ; Kulambar ; Hallejee ; bounded by Khulambar, Juanroo, Warmawa, and Zehav. Shemiran ; a mountainous and desert district on the other side the Diala. Tchowtan ; written Tcheftan ; it adjoins Kizzeljee. Kizzeljee ; Terratool. Kara Hassan, a district which sometimes belongs to Bagdad and sometimes to Koordistan ; it is bounded by Kerkook, Leilan, Tchemtchemal, and Shuan.

September 29.—My excellent friend Omar Aga, in talking over his own history and his late persecution, told me that four or five of his principal men were imprisoned with him. The prison was damp and fireless: it was the depth of winter. Every day one or two of his men were taken out and severely bastinadoed, to induce them to tell where their master's money and property were. The same man would sometimes suffer the bastinado twice in a day; yet not one showed the least impatience, or offered to make any confession. One day all Omar Aga's retainers combined, and contrived to let their master know that they had formed a plan for breaking open the prison on that night, putting all to the sword, and carrying off their master to Kerkook; but he positively forbade the attempt. During his imprisonment his men were almost starving; yet not one manifested the slightest wish to change his condition or seek other service. Besides being clansmen, many of Omar Aga's men are sons of those who occupied similar situations in the family of his father. Fakih Kader's (his secretary) mother, wife, little sisters and brothers, are all in Omar Aga's haram, and are considered as integral parts of his family. All his men share with him; do as he does; starve and wear rags when he is poor; make money when he is in office; and all without impatience or surprise, but just as if it were in the ordinary and unavoidable course of things. Omar

Aga himself is just an instance of this attachment. The Pasha, though he really likes him, has had the weakness to treat him very ill at the instigation of Osman Bey, who hates him. Yet Omar Aga being satisfied that the Pasha esteems him, and possessing the greatest respect for Abdurrahman, the father of the Pasha, has never offered to desert him; nor ever murmurs except in conversation with a very confidential friend, and then it is the voice of lamentation, not of querulousness or discontent. Upon my lamenting the Pasha's weakness, Omar Aga suddenly said with great earnestness, "Indeed, Sir, I assure you he is not so in general: it is only with me that he is thus." There was no affectation in this speech; it burst from the heart, and was elicited by the fear that I should think less favourably of his master. Omar Aga is now reduced to great poverty by this ill treatment, arising, as I have observed before, from the enmity of Osman Bey, against whom he does not conceal his wrath; yet he never complains, and endeavours that it should not be suspected that he is in want of anything. Intimate as I have now been with him for some months, he has never even thrown out the slightest hint for anything from me. The richest Turk would have begged downright in half the time. The other day I was dispatching a Tartar to Constantinople: now, Constantinople contains every article both of luxury and necessity that can tempt a native of the East. I asked Omar Aga what I should get for him from thence; he said that he did not recollect anything that he wanted, and immediately changed the conversation. Another person present, the Masraf, desired me to get him a fine amber mouth-piece for his pipe. Omar Aga never courts Osman Bey, who might destroy him if he liked; and he always in his presence carries himself as high as if he had nothing to fear from him. When I asked him why he never went near the Bey except with me, "Because he has used me ill, and I do not like him," was the answer. Omar Aga is, in short, the only native of the East I have ever met with, in the course of rather a long experience among Arabs, Turks, and Persians, to whom I can apply the epithet gentleman in every sense of the word.

September 30. — I have just received another packet from Bombay, to be dispatched to Constantinople. The Tartar who brought it from Bagdad is Rahmet ullah Aga, the same who, during Saed Pasha's troubles, endeavoured to get to Constantinople by the way of Amadia and Van. I had a long talk with him about this road, which is a very curious one. No other Turk has ever attempted to penetrate by that way*.

* To reach Asia Minor by this route, he would have to pass through the wild and inaccessible country of the Chaldean Christian tribes, who, I believe, are the only Christians in the East who have maintained their independence against the Mahometans, to

At Ankowa*, by the recommendation of the Governor of Arbil, he took a Chaldean interpreter to help him among the Chaldean tribes of Julamerk. From Arbil he went to Akra or Naoukor, two days' journey of about twelve hours each. The road was pretty level till he began to ascend the mountain to the fort of Akra. Thence to Amadia was two days' journey of twelve hours each, but over a very mountainous and difficult road. At Amadia, Zebeer whom they have rendered themselves very formidable. The following particulars concerning this curious people are taken from a memorandum book of Mr. Rich's. "The most savage and independent tribes of Julamerk, or Hakkari, are the Chaldean tribes, four in number, who care not for the Prince of Hakkari, and live in a completely barbarous state. They profess Christianity and are followers of Nestorius. The men are all remarkable for strength, size, and bravery, and it is said to be less safe to pass among them than through the Mahometan tribes. They inhabit the country between Amadia and Julamerk, in which tract there is only one Mahometan tribe. They give something to the Prince of Hakkari, occasionally, when he conciliates and entreats them, but never by compulsion. The territory of Hakkari extends to within about two hours' journey from Urmia. Mustafa Khan, the present prince, pays a peshgesh, or present, to Abbas Mirza, of Tabreez."

Gibbon, in mentioning this wild people, says, "The Chalybeans derived their name and temper from the iron quality of the soil; and since the days of Cyrus, they might produce, under the various appellations of Chaldeans and Zanians, an uninterrupted prescription of war and rapine. Under the reign of Justinian, they acknowledged the God and the Emperor of the Romans."—Decline and Fall of the Roman Empire. London. 8vo. 1802. Vol. vii. p. 134.

* A village at a little distance from Arbil, entirely inhabited by Chaldeans.

Pasha, the governor, endeavoured to persuade him to abandon his enterprise, as extremely dangerous if not impracticable, but the Tartar persisted. The Pasha then gave him some directions, among which were to pay for every thing he got, and to show no repugnance to whatever food might be placed before him, but, on the contrary, to praise it, as the people through whose country he was to pass, especially the Christians, were a ferocious, vindictive, and capricious set, extremely irritable withal, and that the slightest offence might be his destruction. He then furnished him with letters, and gave him two or three men who knew the country. But his march was one scene of difficulties; they plundered him of his money and arms, and told him they refrained from further violence for the sake of Zebeer Pasha's letter of recommendation. He was thirteen days going from Amadia to Van, including twenty-four hours' detention at Julamerk *. The province of

* Julamerk is the capital of the Koordish province of Hakkari, in which province likewise is situated Kotch Hannes, the residence of the Chaldean Patriarch, who always commands a division of the army when there is any war between the Prince of Hakkari and Persia, on the frontiers of which, between Julamerk and Salmast, his capital lies. He is reckoned as great an adept in the use of the rifle and the sword as the most accomplished robber of his flock. His Chaldean title is Catolik—and he resides in a large monastery.

Near Julamerk there is said to be a mine of iron, and one of lead, which is the property of the Prince of Hakkari, except on one day of the year, the festival of St. George, when a Nestorian

Hakkari is one exceedingly precipitous and difficult mountain all the way to Van, in many parts covered with thick forests. The inhabitants are wilder than any Koords or Arabs he had ever seen. The mountains were so high, that sometimes, after a slow winding march of four or five hours, the village they had quitted would be seen close as it were at their feet. All the days' marches were very long, and lasted from before sunrise till after sunset in October. About fifty hours from Amadia he came to a straggling village, extending near an hour's march. This was the station or cantonment of a Christian tribe. The huts were all built of logs—the inhabitants the most savage of any that he had seen in that land of savages. These Chaldeans, for so they are, wore hats (tchapka), in form resembling the European hat, made of rice straw. They are unacquainted with wheat or barley, and cultivate only rice, of which they make bread. In person they are more than ordinarily tall and stout. For provisions they could only supply the Tartar with walnuts, honey, and rice bread; but this fare, for which they made him pay extravagantly dear, he praised vehemently, remembering the lesson he had received at Amadia, monastery, dedicated to that saint, has the grant of the produce of these mines for the whole day. This convent lies among the wild Nestorian tribe called the Tchoualakh, three days from Julamerk, and they maintain that on the festival day of the saint the mines yield a greater quantity of ore than on any other.—From a Notebook of Mr. Rich's.—Ed.

though the dust, straw, and ashes bore an equal proportion with the rice in the villanous composition which they denominated bread. Only two or three of them spoke Koordish, and their Chaldean was very nearly unintelligible to the Ankowa interpreters. They marvelled much at the figure of the Tartar, who did not think it prudent to express equal admiration at theirs. They asked him what manner of man he was: he told them he was an Osmanli, but they did not understand what that meant; and, to his great scandal, though he durst not express it, they neither knew nor cared about the Sultan. They comprehended, however, that he was a Mus-sulman, and told him they had been there long before his Mahommed. They did not, however, plunder him, and they parted on the whole very good friends. They told him they had never seen a horseman come over their mountains before. He also saw a great number of devil-worshipping Yezids; but he did not see the Prince of Hakkari, who seems however to have very little power over his subjects, as may be supposed from their being composed entirely of clans. There is no peasantry properly so called, or a peculiar race of cultivators of the soil, either in Amadia or Hakkari, a proof, I think, that these provinces were the original seat of the Koords and Chaldeans: while the presence of a Tajik or Tat race all over Lower Koordistan seems to show it to be a conquered country. At last the Tartar arrived at Van, to his no small joy. Van, though a Koordish principality, said Rahmet ullah, is quite a civilized place; and Dervish Pasha, the prince, told him he had never seen a stranger descend from those mountains.

October 1.—There was a storm of rain this morning, which lasted about an hour. It is very unseasonable, and will, it is supposed, do much harm to the rice crops, which are now getting in.

Below is, I believe, a correct account of the tribes or clans who inhabit that part of Koordistan which is under the government of the Pasha of Sulimania*.

* First—Clans who are settled and inhabit particular districts.

In the district of Pizbder:—

The Sekkir; the Nooreddini. Of these two tribes there are about 100 villages, and they can muster about 1000 musketeers.

In the respective districts bearing their names—

The Shinkis	. 200 families	} These two are pure clans.
Ghellalis	. 150 ditto

The Siwell. The pure origin of these may be questioned, but they are at all events now a tribe, and do not mix with the peasants.

The other districts are mixed. Some inhabitants are of the peasant, some of the clannish race, i. e., no village has inhabitants of one exclusive kind.

Second—Wandering or Encamping Clans.

The Jaf. There are twelve branches of the Jafs. Of the true Jafs, there are not more than 600 families; but under their protection there are fragments of all the tribes of Loristan and Persian Koordistan, which makes the whole strength of the tribe amount to several thousand families. The tribe musters about 1000 infantry and 300 horse; that is to say, in their own defence.

October 2.—Being informed that there was a wedding feast at a house in the outskirts of the town, I determined to become a spectator of it. In

For the service of the Pasha they could not be prevailed on to furnish so many. The whole tribe only pay to government a yearly tribute of thirty purses; sometimes less. The other tribes pay much more in proportion, because they are not so powerful, or so well protected.

The Sheikh Ismaeli . . .	500 families.
Kelhore . . .	200 ditto.
Mendimi . . .	300 ditto.
Kelo Gawani . . .	250 ditto.
Merzink . . .	80 or 90 ditto.	(This was originally a part of the Bulbassis.)
Tileko . . .	100 ditto.
Koosa . . .	60 ditto.
Hamadavend . . .	200 ditto.
Sofiavend . . .	40 or 50 ditto.	(These are part of the Lak nation.)
Ketcheli . . .	40 ditto.
Tchigeni . . .	40 ditto.
Zengeneh . . .	400 ditto,	scattered in villages.
Zend . . .	60 ditto.	(The tribe of Kerim Khan, King of Persia, whose dynasty was overthrown by the Kajars, the tribe of the present king. When they came first into these parts they were wandering, but they are now settled in villages. There are a great many besides established in Zengabad, and many in the Pasha of Bagdad's army.)
Kerwei . . .	60 families.
Lor . . .	60 ditto.	(These are of the Feili tribe.)
Sedeni . . .	100 ditto.
Goorzei . . .	100 ditto.

None of these tribes depend on the Jafs, though the Jafs have many families from among them under their protection, which order to avoid attracting attention, Mr. Bell and I put shawls about our heads, and concealed our dresses with black abbas or Arab cloaks, and, thus accoutred, we set forth at night to see the show. After a long walk we arrived at the place of the feast, an ordinary house; on the roof of which, not above six feet from the ground, we established ourselves among a great crowd of people. The court-yard, which was the scene of revelry, exhibited a crowd of Koords of every age and degree; from the gentleman, with the bush of party-coloured tassels on his head, to the grim savage in goat-skin. Most of them were linked by the hand in the dance called the Tchopée, forming a ring not joined at the ends, which nearly enclosed the court-yard. These evolutions consisted in swinging to and fro with their bodies, and marking time, first with one foot, then with the other, sometimes with good heavy stamps in a way which reminded me of the Irish song, "Rising on Gad and sinking on Suga;" while the gaiety of their hearts would occasionally manifest itself in wild shrieks. Those who did not dance filled up the intervals of the space, or covered the roof of the house which encompassed the court on four sides. Num-are not reckoned here. The Jafs, being strong and well protected, are daily acquiring additions to their numbers from persecuted members of other tribes.

None of the above tribes are entire. They are only fragments of tribes, of which parts exist also in the territory of Simna, of Kermanshah, or of Loristan.

Printed by J. W. Smith, 1851.

bers squatted down in the centre of the dancers' line, among whom were the piper and drummer. The scene was illuminated by three mashalls or torches, and the crowd bore with perfect unconcern the clouds of smoke and irruptions of sparks which poured from these flambeaus. The dancers had been at it above an hour when we arrived. After having enjoyed their exercise for about half an hour more the music ceased, and the dancers were dismissed to make room for others, by a charge made upon them by the master of the house and some friends armed with sticks. When the first set had been thus ejected and the ring cleared, a stout Koord leaped into the arena and amused the company for some minutes by sundry capers and antics with a quarter-staff. The music then struck up again the notes of the Tchopée, and a string of about thirty ladies hand in hand advanced with slow and graceful step, resplendent with gold spangles, and party-coloured silks, and without even the pretext of a veil*. This was really a beautiful sight, and quite a novel one to me, who had never in the East seen women, especially ladies as all of these were, so freely mixing with the men, without the slightest affectation of concealment. Even the Arab tribes women are more scrupulous.

The line or string of ladies moved slowly and wavingly round the enclosure, sometimes advancing a step towards the centre, sometimes retiring, balancing their bodies and heads in a very graceful manner. The tune was soft and slow, and none of their movements were in the least abrupt or exaggerated. I was delighted with this exhibition, which lasted about half an hour. The music then ceased, and the ladies retired to their homes, first veiling themselves from head to foot, which seemed rather a superfluous precaution, as the crowd which was looking on at the dance far exceeded that which they were at any time likely to meet in the streets of Sulimania. Many of them were very fine fresh-looking women.

* See the accompanying plate.

From this exhibition it may be almost superfluous to add, that the Koordish females in their houses are far less scrupulous than Turkish, or even Arab women. Men servants are admitted, and even from strangers they are not very cautious in concealing themselves. When they are going about the town they wear a blue checked sheet over them like the Bagdad women, and a black horse-hair veil also; but this is seldom pulled down over their faces, except they are ladies of very high rank, and meet any particular people by whom they do not choose to be recognized. The Pasha's Haram Agassi, who according to eastern etiquette ought to be a eunuch, and several of the Haram servants, are stout bearded Koords. Kai Khosroo Bey's ladies at the Jaf camp did not attempt to hide themselves even from our people, and when Mrs. Rich went to return their visit in their own tents, there were as many men as women present. The lower classes, even in Sulimania, go about the town without any veil, and may be seen early in the summer mornings in bed with their husbands, or just rising and going about their occupations on the flat roofs of their houses over the streets, which are narrow, and the houses not elevated above five or six feet from the ground. But notwithstanding this freedom and apparent shamelessness, no women can conduct themselves with more real propriety than the Koordish ladies, and their morality far exceeds that of the Turkish females.

The condition of the women is far better in Koordistan than in Turkey or Persia; that is to say, they are treated as equals by their husbands, and they laugh at and despise the slavish subjection of the Turkish women *. There is something approaching

* Instances of masculine courage are by no means rare among the Koordish females. Fyzullah Effendi, who was once Divan Effendi to the Pasha of Bagdad, called on me one day. He is a very ingenious man and has a considerable taste for mechanics. He described to me an organ he had built, which he arranged to play Turkish and Persian airs. On going away, when his servants brought him his horse and collected about him, he turned to me and said he would show me the greatest curiosity I had perhaps yet seen. He then called one of his servants to me, and asked me whether I saw in him anything particular. I said, no; but that I thought him a stout lad. He told me he was not a lad, but a girl of the Koordish tribe of Bulbassi, and that she was the finest horsewoman and bravest soldier, and best servant it was possible to imagine. That her conduct was irreproachable, and did as much honour to her own sex, as her courage would have done to the other. That she was a virgin, and that a Turk having once attempted her honour she ran him through the body, saying she would do so even to her master in a like case. She boasted of having several times charged to the mouth of a loaded cannon, to domestic comfort in Koordistan ; in Turkey the idea is quite unknown. There is, however, a species of tyranny practised by some of their powerful and licentious princes, which would not be submitted to in Turkey. If a person of this character takes a fancy to a girl, he will often force her parents to marry her to him (his religious scruples preventing him from procuring her in any other way); and when he is tired of her he will divorce her, and make one of his servants take her to wife. This species of oppression the poor peasants are peculiarly obnoxious to. Osman Bey, however, is the only prince of this family who is ever thus guilty. Female captives taken in war (generally Yezids, or the people of other parts of Koordistan) are lawfully taken into the haram as slaves.

The dance is the great passion of the Koordish females. On occasion of a wedding they will volunteer their services, when not invited, and even bring small presents to the bride for permission to exhibit in the dance. On such occasions they always perform in public without any veil, however great the crowd of men may be.

All the Oriental dances are of the same character, without couching her lance till she was within reach of the artillerymen. She was dressed as a Koordish man, with a silk shawl round her head and a poignard at her girdle. She was well-shaped, between twenty-five and thirty years of age, of a marked Koordish countenance, and much sunburnt.

and all probably derived from the remotest antiquity. The Tchopee is a variety of the Greek Sirto, or Romeka, less animated and varied.

The dress of the ladies in Koordistan consists in the usual Turkish large trousers and loose shift, over which they buckle a belt, with two very large gold or silver clasps. The gown is next put on. It is cut like a man's, and is buttoned at the throat, but is left flowing open from the neck downwards, displaying the shift and girdle. It is of striped or variegated silk, chintz, or Guzerat or Constantinople gold stuff, according to the season or wealth of the wearer. Next comes the benish, or cloak, of satin generally, made like the gown, but with tighter sleeves, which do not reach down to the elbows. This, in winter, is replaced by a libada, which is a garment of the same form, but quilted with cotton. In the winter they also wear the tcharokhia, but made of a species of Tartan silk. This tcharokhia is a kind of cloak, or mantle, without sleeves, fastened over the breast, and hanging down behind to the calves of the legs. It is not reckoned full dress, and is replaced on gala days by the benish, which has been borrowed from the Turks or Persians, and is therefore more esteemed than the tcharokhia, which appears to belong peculiarly to Koordistan. They do not use pelisses, but supply the place in very cold weather by an additional gown or two. Of their head dress it is rather difficult to give an adequate description.

It is formed of silk handkerchiefs, or rather, I may say, shawls, of every colour of the rainbow, artificially pinned together in front, so as to form a sort of mitre, about two feet in height. The ends of the shawls hang down behind as low as the ancles. Those who can afford it, ornament the front of their mitres with rows of broad gold lace; from each of which depends a row of little gold leaf-like ornaments. From each side of the turban hangs a string of coral; and under the turban is worn a large muslin shawl, which in front is furled up, and brought into a coil over the breast; behind, it hangs down the back. But this, I am informed, is only worn by married ladies. Much hair is not shown on the forehead; but a zilyf, or lock, depends from each side of the head. The poorer female inhabitants of towns imitate the ladies in the fashion of their habiliments. The peasants in the country merely wear a shift and trowsers of coarse blue calico, the former buckled about the waist with a strap. The tcharokhia is of darker blue stuff, with several white stripes at the bottom, and is knotted by the ends over the breast. The head-dress is a small cap.

The ladies' head-dress is prodigiously heavy, and gives them great pain in learning to wear it. It frequently rubs off a good deal of the hair from the top of the head. What will appear scarcely credible is, that they actually sleep in it. They have small pillows on purpose to support it. They have very few jewels among them. Their ornaments chiefly consist of gold and coral. Ordinary persons have them of small silver coins, little pieces of metal, and glass beads.

The dress of the gentlemen greatly resembles the Turkish in form and materials; but few, except the Pasha and his family, wear cloth or Angora shawl benishes or jubbas*. The usual upper dress is made like the antari or inner vest, but is buttoned at the throat, and allowed to hang open. It is also of flowered or striped silk stuff. This, in winter, is changed for a libada. Round the waist they wear a belt, with large gold, silver, or lapis lazuli clasps. The universal abba covers the whole. But the turban is what principally distinguishes the Koord. It is formed of a kind of tartan or chequered silk; red, yellow and blue†, with gold and silver thread intermixed. This is wound round the head, so as to leave the forehead (and they have very fine manly foreheads) quite exposed. Behind, an immense bush of fringe, or tassels, of the same colours, sewn to the ends of the shawl, hangs down over the back and shoulders, which gives them an inexpressibly wild appearance, especially when they gallop. When they wear Cashmere shawls, which some few do occasionally, they put them on so that the ends shall hang down at the sides and back. The common people wear shoes with ties, much like Europeans. They are either black or yellow, and ornamented with tassels. Some few use the woollen shoe, which I have seen in Persia ; from which country I believe they procure them.

* The benish is an upper, the jubba an under cloak. They are Turkish words.

† All the Koords, both men and women, affect the brightest and most glaring colours in their dress.

The peasantry and poorer tribesmen wear the common antari or gown, over which they put a dress made of a coarse shalloon, open at the breast, secured round the waist by a leathern girdle and brass plates ; and the breadths of the stuff are left unsewn at the skirts, so that they hang down from the girdle in four tails, like those of a coat, two behind and two before. The colour is generally brown or white, the sleeves and breast ornamented with different coloured bobbin. The turban is of a coarse cotton cloth of dark red, striped with blue at the ends. The abba is commonly worn. Those who cannot procure one, or who do not find it sufficiently warm, use instead a cloak of goat skin, with the hair on it, or one of coarse brown woollen stuff. Jackets made of common white felt *, a most inartificial garment, or of goat skin, are also a very general upper dress.

The khanjiar, or poniard, is universal among all classes, ranks and ages. The Jafs and other tribesmen add a wooden mace, the head of which is reinforced with iron stubs. This, with a sabre, and a light shield thrown over the shoulder, form the usual accoutrement of a Koord on foot. Horsemen add the lance and a brace of pistols; and all who possibly can procure it use a shirt of mail with a steel scull-cap, in time of war. The infantry are generally armed with a long heavy rifle, with a fork attached to it, for a rest.

* Called in Koordish kepenek.

The tribe of Shinkis supply the largest body of infantry, and they are reckoned excellent shots. The Jafs also furnish a quota; but the services of tribesmen are not much to be depended on out of their own country, or indeed in any quarrel in which they are not personally interested.

October 4.—A man from Darishmana arrived here to-day. Omar Aga, who knows I am on the look out for curiosities, immediately went to see him, and promises to bring him to me to-morrow. In the mean time he collected from him the following very curious and romantic tale, relating to the origin of the Bebbeh family. It must be premised that Darishmana is a small village in Pizhder, and was the ancient seat of the Bebbehs. The present inhabitants of the village are all of that family, or rather that family is from them, and they give themselves proportionable airs. Some of them now and then visit Sulimania; on which occasion old Abdurrahman Pasha used to humour his highland cousins, and send them back with some present suitable to their wants and condition. In his presence they used to affect great familiarity, and even superiority, as the elder branch. A fellow who had perhaps come to Sulimania driving an ass would sit down with the Pasha before he was asked, draw forth an old short, dirty tobacco-pipe, fill it, strike himself a light, and, regaling himself with a few whiffs, ask the Pasha, "Well, cousin, and how are you?" But to my tale.

"There were two brothers in Darishmana, Fakih Ahmed and Khidder. They had suffered much from the hostility of the Bulbassis, who were the most powerful people of Pizhder. Fakih Ahmed, who was of a bold and proud spirit, quitted his village in disgust, and swore never to return to it unless he should be in a situation to avenge himself. He went to Constantinople and entered into the Turkish service. It so happened that the Sultan was at that time at war with the Franks. (The relation said, the English.) In those days battles were generally decided by single combat. A champion had come forth from the Frank host who had for five days kept the field against the flower of the Turkish chivalry, all of whom he had successively overthrown and slain. Fakih Ahmed volunteered to meet this redoubtable foe; upon which the Sultan sent for him, asked him concerning his country, and being satisfied with his appearance, allowed him to undertake the adventure, first supplying him with a suitable horse and arms. He ran his course, and overthrew the Frank knight. Upon alighting to cut off his head, to his great astonishment he found that his fallen enemy was a young maiden, who besought him to spare her life and that she would marry him. He brought her back to the Turkish camp in triumph; and upon the Sultan's asking him what reward he should bestow on him, he claimed and obtained a firman, constituting him Bey, and bestowing on him the village and lands of Darishmana in perpetuity. He here displayed his modesty or his ignorance; had he claimed the whole of Koordistan he would have obtained it. Fully satisfied with his new acquisition, he returned in triumph to his native place with his new wife, by whom he had two children, Baba Suliman and Boodakh Keighan. I should have mentioned that the English maiden's name was Keighan. He had frequent contests with the Bulbassis, whom he reduced into considerable order. One day, when he was absent, a large party of them came down on a predatory excursion. Keighan sallied forth alone, and put the whole of them, amounting to four or five hundred horse, to flight, killing a great number. She then summoned the people of Darishmana together, and addressed them as follows:—‘Men of Darishmana, Fakih Ahmed spared my life when I was in his power. I have this day requited the service, which was all I wanted or waited for. Now tell Fakih Ahmed what you have seen, and also that I am gone where he shall see me no more. Tell him that I charge him not to follow me, for it will be vain, and I shall do him harm, which, God knows, I would not willingly be the cause of.' So saying, she turned her horse, and was out of sight in a moment.

" Fakih Ahmed on his return was, as might be supposed, astonished at what had happened, and deeply grieved at the loss of his beloved Keighan, whom he resolved to follow in spite of her prohibition. He came up with her in the valley of Khidheran, which is in Pizhder, and besought her to return with him. 'It is impossible,' she said; 'you are a Mahometan; I am a Frank: I go to the land of my fathers. Farewell. Come not near me, or I will harm you.' Still the enamoured Fakih Ahmed persisted, when she raised her spear, and thrust him through the shoulder. He fell, and she galloped off. But she had not gone far, when she bethought herself that she had made him but a poor requital for his mercy to her when her life was at his disposal, and that, though he was a Mahometan, he was yet the father of her children. She therefore relented, returned, found him yet breathing, and applied a powerful ointment to his wound, which placed him out of danger till he should receive succour, which was not far off. She then left him again. The ardent lover and husband, as soon as he had recovered from his wound, nothing abashed by the rough usage he had experienced at her hands, still persisted in his design of following and recovering her ; and in pursuit of her he reached Frenghistan. At night-fall he came to a large city, where he heard the sound of revelry. The mehter khana or band was playing, the mashallahs or torches lighted, and all the other preparations making for a toey or nuptial-feast.

“Uncertain what he should do, or where he should take up his abode for the night, he resolved to submit himself to the guidance of chance, and remain where his horse stopped. He accordingly gave his horse the reins, and the animal stopped at the door of the house of an old woman, who, after making some difficulty, consented to receive him as her guest. He inquired from her the cause of the rejoicing. She informed him that the daughter of the King had gone to war with the Mahometans, that she was just returned, after having been missing for several years, and that she was then going to be married to her cousin. Fakih Ahmed entreated the old woman to procure him admission to the nuptial-feast as a spectator, which she at length agreed to do, provided he would disguise himself in woman’s attire. He so managed as to be close at hand during the first interview between the fair Keighan and her proposed spouse. The lady came forth ; and the ungracious bridegroom immediately saluted her with a box on the ear, saying, 'Thou hast been a prisoner among the Mahometans; thou hast been dishonoured; and darest thou to show thyself before me?' The bride, in her anguish, exclaimed in Koordish, a language that had become familiar to her, 'Oh, Fakih Ahmed, that thou wert here!' Immediately the person invoked stepped forth, slew the bridegroom, and escaped with the bride to Constantinople, where the Sultan bestowed on him an addition to his former grant.

"Fakih Ahmed and his now willing bride returned to Pizhder, where he lived happily with her for the rest of his days. Before he died, he completely subjected the districts of Pizhder, Mergeh, and Mawutt. He was succeeded by his eldest son Baba Suliman, the ancestor of the present princes of Sulimania, who conquered the remaining districts of that portion of Koordistan now under their authority. The second son, Boodakh Keighan, died without issue."

I had before heard some fragments of this tale confusedly related by the Pasha, who boasted of his European descent from Keighan, and said he might possibly be my relation. But he referred the incident to the grandfather of Suliman Baba. The ladies of the family told nearly the same story to Mrs. Rich.

In this story, which I have told almost in the very words of the narrator, without adding or altering the slightest trait of character, there is much of the spirit of chivalry, with which the Orientals are totally unacquainted ; at least at the present day. The incidents are quite foreign to the style and nature of their inventions, and look as if they were derived from some real occurrences, but of an age far anterior to that assigned them by the narrator. It would be curious if this were traceable to some chivalrous story at the time of the crusaders, of the age of Saladin, himself a Koordish prince, of which the tradition has been corrected by the ignorant Koordish narrator, who would naturally conceive no Sultan but the Sultan of Constantinople could be intended ; and would refer a remarkable story to the immediate ancestor of their favourite hero Baba Suliman, whose own life is too well known to admit of such interpolations. I could adduce many instances of similar confusion of ages and dates by Oriental narrators.

The Pasha, observing how curious I am after Koordish history, has very kindly sent for Ahmed Bey, a venerable member of his own family, who is said to have attained the age of a hundred ; and who is also celebrated for remembering a great number of traditions relating to the history of his family. These traditions are now gradually being forgotten, though many of them may be highly worth preserving. This Bebbeh patriarch usually resides on his estate in Shehrizoor.

CHAPTER XI.

The Pasha melancholy and depressed—His eldest Son sent a hostage to Kermanshah—Sickness of the youngest—Dissensions in his family—Ahmed Bey of Darishmana—Tribes of Rewandiz—Koordish funeral—Bebbeh family—Series of Bebbah Princes—Death of Pasha's little Boy by Small-pox—Affliction of the Pasha—Suliman Bey—Commerce of Sulimania—Conversation with Osman Bey—The Pasha's desire to abdicate—Omar Aga—His intelligence and accuracy—Comparison between the Koords, the Turks, and the Persians—Lokman—Farewell visit to the Pasha—Religious conversation—Osman Bey ordered to his Government—Refuses to obey—Traits of Koordish character—Flight of the great Dervish Sheikh Khaled—Pasha's last visit to Mr. Rich—Interesting conversation—Pasha's grief for the loss of his Son—His character—Preparations for leaving Koordistan—Sorrow at bidding adieu to its interesting People.

October 7.—I WAS this morning with the Pasha. He appeared so very depressed, and so melancholy, that he made my heart ache. I grieved to see so worthy a man in distress. His eldest son Abdu-rahman Bey, a little boy seven years old, was sent off three days ago to Kermanshah as a hostage; his second son, a beautiful child, has just fallen ill of the small-pox, and there are great dissensions in his family. Osman Bey gives him a great deal of trouble. He forced himself to talk to me, but it was plain he was very heavy at heart. Ahmed Bey, the old Koord, whom the Pasha had sent for on my account, came to see me. He is not more than ninety-two years of age ; a fine-looking old man : but his recollection has become so confused, that it is very difficult to procure a direct answer from him ; and it is only by watching his particular moments, when something strikes him, and he begins a conversation himself, that any thing can be collected from him. In this he resembles old Elspeth in the Antiquary. When it was explained to him who I was, he said at once, “ Ah ! we are relations ; our forefathers were related ; ” alluding evidently to the romantic story of Keighan the English girl, and Fakih Ahmed the Koordish chief. But when I asked him about it, he relapsed again, and became confused. The Pasha told me, by watching his moments of recollection, he had obtained from him the following particulars. Baba Suliman was the youngest of twelve sons. His father’s name was Mir Suliman* ; and Baba Suliman was so denominated from being a posthumous child. He conquered all this country from the Turks and Persians. He did not effect this without hard struggles and various fortune ; and at last the Turks and Persians uniting, drove him out of Lower Koordistan. He then took refuge in Rewandiz†, and

* Mir Suliman was the grandson of Mir Mahmood, or Mahmood Bey of Pizhder, and Baba Suliman was consequently great-great grandson of Mir Mahmood, to whom some attribute the romantic adventure of Keighan. Most throw it much farther back than the father of Baba Suliman.

† Rewandiz, or Rewan-diz, is a castle belonging to an independent tribe of Koords, commanded by Mustafa Bey. It is leaving his wife and family there, he himself went to Constantinople. This happened in the year of the Hejira 1111*, the memory or tarikh of the event being preserved in a verse connected with the great earthquake at Tabreez, which happened a few years before. At Constantinople he attracted the notice of the Sultan, and became a Vizir or Pasha of three tails. He either conquered or governed Baba Dagb, which was named from him, and he died in these parts. This part of Koordistan remained in the hands of the Turks, as a banner of the azalet of situated on a very high mountain, a part of Zagros, cut down on one side by the Zab; on the other only approachable by narrow defiles, which are all well defended. They are excellent musketeers. A few years ago Abbas Mirza sent an army against them, which was obliged to retreat with the loss of its artillery, which is now in the castle of Rewan-diz. They are a very savage people; but caravans pass through their territory generally with safety, only paying a paj or duty. In their dress the tribes of Rewan-diz resemble the people of Amadia; but their language is more like the dialect used in Keuy Sanjiak.

* That is, A.D. 1700. In substituting a year of the Christian era for one of the Hejira, it is not only to be remembered that the latter era commenced on the 15th of July, A.D. 622, but that, while our year consists of three hundred and sixty-five days, six hours, and eleven minutes, the Mahometan or lunar year contains but three hundred and fifty-four days, eight hours, forty-eight minutes. Hence it follows that no year of the Hejira corresponds throughout to a given year of the Christian era; and of course that not even the year of the latter can be ascertained from a date expressed in the former era, unless the day of the year be also given. The commencement, however, of a year of the Hejira may be calculated by attending to these circumstances.—Communicated by a Friend to the Ed.

Shehrizoor, the capital of which azalet, or province, is Kerkook. It was long before the Bebbeh family resumed their ascendancy over it.

All the above particulars were confirmed by the recollection of many other persons.

As I was going to the palace to-day, I saw at a distance three military standards moving along. I imagined a large body of troops was on the march; but, to my great surprise, I was informed it was a funeral. This custom is peculiar to Koordistan. In Kermanshah they accompany the body to the grave with music and singing.

In talking with the Pasha to-day about the history of Koordistan, I ventured to remark that I was surprised he was not better informed about the history of his own family. He said modestly that it was a history not worth recording, it was not that of a royal family, but of a petty clan. I told him his was an ancient and honourable family. He said not very ancient; that they had only been Pashas for little more than a century. I told him I reckoned the degradation of his family from that period. This compliment struck him instantly. His clannish and family pride was at once awakened, and his countenance brightened to a degree of animation not very usual with him. Even a man who has reduced himself to the state of religious indifference of the Pasha is not without a latent spark of pride or vanity on some subjects. He afterwards told me he had no relish for history, except that of the saints and prophets, and as much as was necessary to establish their synchronisms. The only history that he would willingly read besides these was the Shahnameh.

October 9.—I was both surprised and pleased this evening by Omar Aga's bringing me a long scroll of paper, rolled up like a Hama-el, or Prayer, secured with a flap of leather, for being always worn in the pocket. This contained a series of the princes of the Bebbeh family, from Suliman down to the present day. By dint of inquiries, he found this in the possession of a Koord, whose ancestors had been in the habit of entering events on this scroll, with their dates, and he had followed their example. It was written in Persian. This was a real prize, and the more valuable, as it will form the continuation of the Tarikh al Akrad, should I be fortunate enough to procure a copy of that interesting work. I immediately sat down, and made a translation of this greasy muster-roll*.

October 10.—Omar Aga brought me to-day an old book containing scraps of religious poetry, accounts, remedies, in which the owner had also entered some dates and facts. I extracted some dates and synchronisms from it†.

October 12.—To my very great regret, poor little Ahmed Bey, the second son of the Pasha, died this morning of the small-pox. He was a delightful child and very fond of us. Mr. Bell offered his services, and saw the child twice ; but he could not persuade the parents to give him medicine, or keep him sufficiently cool ; though in this latter particular they at last attended a little to Mr. Bell's directions, and confessed themselves the almost instantaneous effects of it. The Pasha is in a dreadful state of affliction. All the Koords love their wives and children, and very fine children they have. A Turk does not care much about either*.

* See Appendix.

† See Appendix.

I had determined on an expedition into Shehrizoor, to survey that part of the country, which is the most interesting of all Koordistan in point of antiquities ; but I deferred it on account of the sickness of the Pasha's son. This he took kindly. It is now too late to think of it, as we must prepare for our journey to Mousul.

October 14.—I went to pay my visit of condolence to the Pasha to-day. It was a hard task, but a necessary and a friendly one. It was evident that his heart was bursting, notwithstanding he made the most manly efforts to hide it. I could scarcely help identifying myself with him, and feeling for the moment as if I had lost my own son. There never was a worthier or more feeling man than the Pasha in any country. He loves his wife and children as ardently as the best European could do. There was something quite frightful in a kind of levity which he once all on a sudden affected. I left him with a great weight on my spirits.

* As one proof among many, which might be given to the truth of this assertion, the following is taken from another of Mr. Rich's Journals :—"The Divan Effendi called on me the other day on business. In the course of conversation, he mentioned incidentally, with perfect composure, that he had that morning buried his son, an interesting infant of about a twelvemonth old : 'I went this morning and buried my son, and then I went to council,' said he, with unconcern."—Ed.

I afterwards went to Osman Bey. He was sitting in his unfinished kiosk, muttering prayers, and telling his beads. He was serious, and there was evidently something on his mind, but it was not pure sorrow. He talked to me about a violin I had made him a present of some time ago, and begged me not to forget to order strings for him. There is a great difference between him and the Pasha.

In the afternoon I went to pay my visit of condolence to Suliman Bey. He was evidently nearly as much affected as the Pasha himself, but he was calmer and more collected. I loved him the better for his feeling: indeed he is a very estimable young man, a little too serious for his age, and too much attached to priests and dervishes, but without any admixture of fierceness or fanaticism. In his countenance he resembles the late Abdurrahman Pasha more than either of his brothers, and he is stouter and taller than they are. His fine blue eyes give a pleasing expression of calm dignity to his countenance. Every time I see him, I get more attached to him. I announced my intention of soon quitting Koordistan. Suliman Bey and all the Koords seemed really sorry, and were very anxious to make me give them a promise of coming again next year. I feel quite heavy at the idea of quitting this friendly people, and the probability of never seeing them more. It will be long ere I again live among people who treat me with so much real kindness and hospitality wherever I may go.

October 15.—The commerce of Sulimania is not extensive, and is principally carried on with the following places by the means of caravans :—

Tabreez.—To which place a caravan goes generally about once a month, but this is not regular. They bring raw silk, silk stuffs, &c. The raw silk is mostly exported to Bagdad ; the stuffs are for the use of Koordistan. The returns from Sulimania are principally made in dates, coffee, and other articles from Bagdad.

Erzeroom.—At least once a year a caravan goes from Sulimania to Erzeroom. It carries dates, coffee, &c., and brings back iron, copper, and mules. Great purchases are made of these animals. All the best mules of these parts come from Erzeroom.

Hamadan and Sinna.—Once a month, at least, a small caravan comes from these places, bringing ghee, dried fruits, honey, and steel from Casbin.

Kerkook.—With this place there is continual intercourse. The articles imported are boots and shoes, and some coarse cotton cloth. The returns are pulse, honey, gall-nuts, sumach, fruits, rice, ghee, cotton, sheep, and cattle. Kerkook is, in fact, the mart of all the productions of Koordistan.

Mousul.—With Mousul communications are also pretty frequent. The articles imported are boots and shoes, turban pieces, chintz, and printed cottons, Damascus and Diarbekir stuffs, &c. The returns are gall-nuts, &c.

Bagdad.—The communications between Sulimania and this place are constant. The imports from Bagdad are dates, coffee, Indian and European stuffs, and cloth. The exports are pulse, tobacco, cheese, ghee, sumach, gum Arabic, tallow, and common soap.

October 16.—Osman Bey came to see me this evening, and sat about two hours with me. He talked much upon the affairs of his country, and told me, in particular confidence, that the Pasha has now serious thoughts of abdicating, and that he is using all his endeavours to dissuade him. This is the more honourable in him, since there is no doubt that, in that event, he would be Pasha. Indeed the Shahzadeh of Kermanshah has already more than once offered him the post, to my certain knowledge. Osman Bey says he sat up with the Pasha till past midnight, last night, endeavouring to persuade him to summon resolution. He told him, that since God had called him to that situation, he was bound to fulfil its duties, and that he had no right to consult his own feelings and inclinations. The Pasha's only wish is to live in peace and retirement with his wife and children. Osman Bey said, "While I have breath, my brother shall not abdicate if I can possibly prevent it."

In the afternoon the Pasha sent an apology to me for not having called on me lately. "But he sees," said the Pasha, "the state I am in. I loved that poor child better than Jacob loved Joseph."

October 18.—This evening I showed Omar Aga some of my field-plans*, which, to my great surprise and satisfaction, he comprehended perfectly. He told me the names of several spots and summits of hills, showed me where to fill up some places of which I was ignorant, from not having seen them, corrected some parts, and recognized even the smallest mound on our road. This is a great proof both of his intelligence and the accuracy of my sketches. I have met with people in Bagdad who had studied mathematics, as they called it, practically, but who could not form any notion of a map or plan.

Omar Aga, immediately on taking the field-book into his hands, turned each sketch in the direction of our road, and traced it with his finger, without hesitation. His natural intelligence has been improved by being a mountaineer, and accustomed to trace chains of hills, and to look down into valleys. All inhabitants of mountainous countries readily comprehend a plan. The maker of the plans in relief of Mount Blanc and the neighbouring country is the barber of Chamouny; and the beautiful map of the Tyrol was drawn by peasants. I could engage, in a very few lessons, to teach Omar Aga the use of the sextant, and how to take a field-sketch. I am sorry this did not occur to me before. During my stay at Sulimania, before I went to Ahmed Kulwan, I had time enough for the undertaking, and on my subsequent journey I could have exercised him under my own eye. The advantages to science, from having so intelligent an observer, who is constantly going over such unknown and interesting countries, would be prodigious, and he might in his turn have instructed others, and propagated science and knowledge.

* These were plans of the country between Sulimania, Sinna, and Banna, through which Mr. Rich had so lately been travelling in company with Omar Aga.—Ed.

I observe in general the Koords are much more eager after information, much more diffident of themselves, and much easier to instruct than the Turks, and, I believe, than the Persians either; for there are certain things which a Persian will readily adopt, but others in literature and science in which he conceives himself to be highly superior to other nations. A Turk has a comfortable idea of his own superiority in everything, and has a thorough contempt for whatever he does not understand.

One swallow does not make a summer. One or two persons in a nation who thirst after knowledge and improvement are only exceptions to the general character. Such is the natural energy and activity of the human mind, that it will sometimes pierce the veil which pride, prejudice, and fanaticism hold before it; and there are few, even of the most savage nations, who cannot show, at different periods of their history, some person who has outstripped his age and country. The Jehan Numa, or geography of Haji Khalfah, was for its time a very superior work, and contained all the geographical knowledge to be met with in European books at that time; and Haji Khalfah himself was, for a Turk, a very enlightened man. But Haji Khalfah has no successors, and what Turk now ever reads the Jehan Numa? or has the slightest notion of the relative positions of countries, even those belonging to his own nation? If he studies mathematics and geography, he invariably has recourse to Euclid, the Almagest, and the old story of the Seven Climates, the sea of darkness, the one habitable quarter of the globe, or Rub i Meskoon, never puzzling himself to think how these theories can be reconciled with modern improvements and discoveries.

The printing press of Constantinople has done nothing towards enlightening the nation. But few good books have been printed, and they are not much sought after, and never used when obtained. The only works which have issued from that press which are in any estimation are the dictionaries.

Abbas Mirza is establishing a press at Tabreez. We shall see if it will do more for the Persians than that of Constantinople has done for the Turks. A nation is not to be improved by force, or by the efforts of a single person, however rational or powerful he may be. However, the Persians have a much greater natural aptitude than the Turks; and had Constantinople been their capital, they would long before this have taken their place among the European nations. The Mahometan religion is a bar to all improvement. A nation could not become civilized and remain Mahometan. Islamism is, without exception, the religion which is the most exclusive of all improvement, and the most favourable to the permanence of falsehood and error. Mahomet has meddled with everything, and poisoned everything he touched. He has made everything—science, art, history, manners—matters of religion, and placed a bar against all improvement, or new notions in any of them. A Turk blasphemes who believes any point of ancient history concerning which Mahomet has pronounced his opinion. I once mentioned Arrian's History of Alexander. Omar Aga was extremely desirous of learning some particulars from so ancient and authentic a source. In telling him the story, something that I said happened to be at variance with the Mahometan account. A Shinki Koord present said, that history may be as old as the time of Alexander himself, but it cannot be authentic, since our Prophet has declared so and so. This suppressed Omar Aga's curiosity immediately. The Shinki afterwards said, "The Jews and Christians in the time of our Prophet used to ask him all sorts of questions concerning points of their ancient history, in order to try whether he would answer correctly or no, and thus prove his divine mission. He answered all by the word of God, which is preserved in the Koran and Hadees*."

Some of the Mahometans believe Alexander the Great to have been a prophet, others that he was merely a hero. Of Lokman, in like manner, some say he was a prophet, others a sage †.

* Tradition.

† The following account of Lokman is from the Bibliothèque Orientale of D'Herbelot. "The 31st Chapter of the Koran is called Sourat Lokman, and Mahomet supposes God to say, 'We have given wisdom to Lokman.' Some of the Mahometan authors maintain that he was a nephew of Job's on the sister's side, and that consequently he had an hereditary right to prophecy, and was a prophet. One author calls him a son of Beor, the son of Nakor, the son of Terah, and consequently a grand-nephew of Abraham. Another author informs us he was born in the time of David, and that he lived to the time of Jonah; but in this case he must have lived many centuries. Some authors indeed do say he lived three hundred years. However, most of the Mahometan doctors are agreed that Lokman did not rank among the prophets. He was born in a low condition, and was by trade a carpenter or a tailor—some say a shepherd. All are agreed that he was a native of Nubia or Abyssinia, of the race of the black slaves with thick lips, who are brought out of that country and sold. Lokman was carried off and sold to the Israelites, under the reigns of David and Solomon. One day while he was taking his mid-day sleep, called by the Arabs cailoulat, some angels entered his chamber and October 19.—I called upon the Pasha to-day to pay my last visit. He was more composed than the last time; but he was yet melancholy, and often saluted him, without allowing him to see them. Lokman hearing a voice and seeing no one, made no answer to their salutation. The angels continued :—‘ We are the messengers of God, thy Creator and ours, who has sent us to you to declare to you his intention of making you a king, and his vicegerent on the earth.’ Lokman answered, ‘ If it is by an absolute command of God that I am to become what you declare, his will be done in all things. I hope he will give me grace to fulfil faithfully his commands; but if he gives me the liberty of choosing a condition of life, I should rather desire to be left in the one I am now in; and that he will be pleased to preserve me from offending him, without which all the greatness of the world would be a burden to me.’ This answer of Lokman’s was so pleasing to the Almighty, that he immediately conferred upon him the gift of wisdom to such a degree of perfection, that he became capable of instructing all mankind by upwards of ten thousand parables and sayings, each of which is more precious than the whole world. Lokman was one day seated in the midst of a large company of people who were listening to him, when a great man among the Jews, who saw him surrounded with listeners, inquired of him if he was not the black slave who formerly had had charge of such a one’s sheep. Lokman answered, that he was. How, then, said the Jew, have you attained to such a high degree of wisdom and virtue? Lokman replied, ‘ By faithfully attending to three things—always to speak the truth, keeping inviolably my word, and never meddling with what did not concern me.’ One author mentions that David having one day inquired of Lokman how he had risen that morning, Lokman answered, ‘ I rose from the midst of my dust.’ This answer gave David a high esteem for Lokman, whose wisdom and humility he greatly admired. Another writer informs us that his sepulchre was to be seen at Ramah, a small town not far from Jerusalem; that he was an Abyssinian by birth, a Jew in religion, and that he was buried near the seventy prophets, who lost their lives in one day near Jerusalem.”

sighed deeply. He talked mostly upon religious subjects in his usual way, asked me how many gospels there were; whether they were sent down immediately from God, or merely written by man from divine inspiration; whether Christ was again to descend and govern the world, or merely to appear at the day of judgment. He told me about Dejjal or Antichrist*, Gog and Magog, &c. He was as kind as ever, and told me that he must see me once more before we parted, and that he would come out to my camp to-morrow.

I afterwards went to Osman Bey. He looked serious, as before; but had a kind of determination and fierceness, like a man who has set his back against the wall. It appears that Mahmood Pasha has, at the recommendation of the Pasha of Bagdad, positively insisted on his brother's going to his government of Keuy Sanjiak. This Osman Bey refuses to do, as he is afraid that affairs will fall into the hands of the 'Turks, as soon as he is out of the way, to the utter ruin of his country. The Pasha of

* Dejjal signifies liar or impostor; it means also a person who has only one eye and one eyebrow, such as the Mahometans describe Antichrist. They likewise call him Al Massih al Dejjal, or the false Messiah. As Jesus Christ, who is acknowledged by the Mahometans to be the Messiah, rode into Jerusalem mounted on an ass, they maintain that Antichrist will do the same. The Mahometans believe that Antichrist is to come at the end of the world; that Jesus Christ, who never died according to them, is to come and encounter him at his second coming; and that, after overcoming him, he will then die.

Bagdad cannot bear that the family should be united. He it was who, as I always suspected, and have since learnt to a certainty, succeeded in bringing Abdullah Pasha into trouble ; and he is now endeavouring to remove Osman Bey, and stir up a quarrel between him and his brother. Osman Bey's conduct, throughout the whole of the late transactions, has been that of an honourable man, and one who has the interests of his country at heart. The Pasha's great fault is his weakness and unaccountable reverence for the Turks ; which proceeds, however, from a religious feeling. I am sometimes surprised at the Pasha's want of spirit in this particular. It is melancholy to see how he is deceived by the Pasha of Bagdad, whom he habitually calls " Effendimiz," or " My Master." If he knew his own strength and interests, he might make the Pasha of Bagdad do what he chose and treat him with proper consideration. Osman Bey never calls him anything else than " The Vizir." When I had been some time with Osman Bey, the Masraf came in. Osman Bey said in a very decided tone to him, " It is useless to talk upon that affair. The Pasha is both my elder brother and my superior ; he may punish me, or deprive me of my estates, but I will not go to Keuy Sanjiak."

I soon after left him. In the afternoon I heard that the Pasha had sent him peremptory orders to go to Keuy Sanjiak, otherwise he would take his lands from him, and forbid any persons visiting him. At the same time he publicly lamented the weakness which had, for the seven years of his reign, rendered him too ready to listen to Osman Bey's suggestions.

Whatever may be Osman Bey's faults, he certainly has behaved most honourably in all the late affairs. He persuaded his brother not to abdicate, and refused the Prince of Kermanshah's invitation to come to him. In either case he well knew he would undoubtedly be Pasha. It grieves me to see such creatures as the Turks able to sow dissensions among the members of so respectable a family.

I was resolved, before I left this place, to speak a good word for my old friend Abdullah Pasha. Osman Bey said that all had been brought about by Turkish intrigue, and that Abdullah Pasha was undoubtedly innocent of much that had been laid to his charge. He told me, moreover, that the Pasha had lately relented, and applied to the Pasha of Bagdad for permission to release his uncle, but that Daoud Pasha would not allow it. I told him I trusted there would be nothing worse to be apprehended for him than a little personal restraint for a short time. "Certainly not," said Osman Bey. "We are not like the Turks; none of us would touch a hair of him for the whole world."

We have a curious savage attending us, Mohammed Tchaoush. He is a man of Omar Aga's, and his father served Omar Aga's family in the same capacity. The other evening we were walking out. I wanted to say something to Omar Aga, who was at some distance before us. Mahommed Tchaoush, by way of calling his master, whistled after him, and Omar Aga, who seemingly well understood this kind of summons, immediately turned round to see who called him. Mrs. Rich wished to make a present of a rough goat-skin jacket to one of the servants who was ill, and asked Mahommed Tchaoush what might be the price of one. "Why the price," said the fellow, who speaks a little Turkish, "is from five to ten piastres; but if you want it for yourself I would advise you rather to get a felt jacket cut out!" These felt jackets are made of the common thick packing-felt, or nimmud, and literally stand alone. They are worn by shepherds and other common Koords who are much exposed to the weather; probably also Mrs. Mahommed Tchaoush wears one.

The Koords are not noisy or boisterous among themselves when talking, like the Persians; but they are given to strange sudden shouts and shrieks. When one Koord wants to call another, or to attract his attention, he roars out, "Ho, Hamaka *!" "Ho (long protracted) Hamaka, ho, ho, ho; wurra wurra!" The other always answers by a similar shout. The Jafs shout in this manner, and talk to one another from hill to hill. The Koords seldom go along a road straight and quietly for any length of time. Without any motive, they will on a sudden give a shriek, dash their horses out at full gallop, and return again, when going a march or journey. Omar Aga one night, when on service in Persian Koor-distan, dispatched two of his men to a village not far from the road to buy bread, as the march had been a long one. The night was quite dark. After waiting a long time, he suddenly heard his horsemen coming towards him full speed over the stones. As the country was not in a very good state, or rather was not very friendly to the Bebbehs, Omar Aga immediately imagined that his men were pursued by some enemy. He and the men with him consequently got ready their arms. On a sudden the noise ceased. After some delay, not conceiving what could have happened, he advanced cautiously in the direction from whence the noise had come, and found to his great surprise a horse without a rider, a man extended on the ground, and a horseman standing beside him. It now turned out that these were his men, who had, on leaving the village with the bread they had been ordered to purchase, matched their horses together for a small sum, and ran their race immediately, though the country was unknown to them, the ground broken and stony, and the night pitch dark. The consequence was that one of them was thrown and had his thigh broken.

* A Koordish edition of Mahommed, Ahmed or Mahmood.

The Koords are bold but unscientific horsemen. They push over any ground at speed, and twist and turn their horses about without any mercy. It is all done by roughness and force and mere sticking on, and they are not good judges of the breed of a horse. Almost all their horses, even of the Arab breed, become vicious, startlish, and restless. A Koord prefers a hot-tempered horse with some vice; he thinks it shows skill and boldness in the rider. The Arabs, on the contrary, are fine, temperate horsemen. You may always ride a horse with pleasure after an Arab; sometimes after a Turk; but never after a Koord. They, however, take great care of their horses, and there are many Koordish gentlemen who groom their horses with their own hands. Perhaps they feed them too well and keep them too warm, which renders them less hardy than one might imagine they would be among such a people. A fancy has now got among them for becoming possessed of Arab horses; and they give immense sums often for very indifferent animals, of a very equivocal breed. This fashion has greatly discouraged the breed of the real Koordish horse, which was an excellent, hardy animal, well adapted for the service of light cavalry. This has now almost entirely disappeared, and has been supplanted by weak half-bred horses imported from Bagdad and the low country. The Arab horses rarely breed well in Koordistan. All the colts are indifferent, and have very little of the Arab character.

The Koords are excellent scouts and gainers of intelligence from a hostile camp, into the very heart of which they will insinuate themselves, nay, even into the tent of the commander. When acting against the Pasha of Bagdad, the enterprise is greatly facilitated by there being always a considerable body of auxiliary Koords of the deposed party in the Turkish army. Abdullah Pasha told me that, on one occasion, when his brother Abdurrahman Pasha * sent a Koord into the camp of the Pasha of Bagdad, the fellow, not being able to learn all he wanted, actually seized and brought off a man out of the camp, and conducted him into Abdurrahman's presence, to be examined at leisure. The Koords are greatly given to music ; all their music is of the melancholy cast. Some of the airs, such as " Mulki Jan," " Ben Kuzha Benaz," and " Az de Naledem," are wild and pretty. Many of them are in alternate chorus. The tune of the reapers, singing " Ferhad and Shireen," reminded me of the gondoliers' chaunt of Tasso at Venice.

I have in no place seen so many fine hale old people of both sexes as in Koordistan ; and notwithstanding the apparent disadvantages of the climate, the Koords are in general a very stout healthy-look-

* When old Abdurrahman Pasha was expiring, his family and relations had great difficulty in calming his feelings of mortification, which sometimes burst forth even with violence, at the idea that he was dying quietly and ignobly in his bed ; and that it had not rather been his fate to be laid low in the field of honour. This is a most uncommon feeling for an Oriental.

ing people. The children too are clean-skinned, rosy-looking children. A Bagdad child has a perfectly unwholesome appearance, with swelled belly, yellow morbid flesh, and moving as if it had the rickets; it is quite disagreeable to touch him. A Koordish child is a hardy, light, active little creature; and they are all remarkably well behaved.

The difference of physiognomy between the clansman and peasant Koord is perfectly distinguishable. The latter has a much softer and more regular countenance; the features are sometimes quite Grecian. The tribesman is more what is called a hard-featured man, with a thick prominent forehead, abrupt lines, and eyes sunk in his head, which are usually fixed in a kind of stare. Light grey, and even blue, is a common colour for the eye. The clansmen too may be easily known by their firm step and open, determined manner. At the first glance you can tell that they are the lords of the country.

October 20.—This morning the great Sheikh Khaled ran away. Notwithstanding his escape was sudden and secret, he managed to carry his four wives along with him. It is not yet known what direction he has taken. The other day the Koords placed him even above Abdul Kader, and the Pasha used to stand before him and fill his pipe for him; to-day they say he was a Kafir or Infidel, and tell numbers of stories of his arrogance and blasphemy.

He lost his consideration on the death of the Pasha's son. He said he would save his life, and that he had inspected God's registers concerning him, &c. The cause of his flight is variously reported. Some say he had been making mischief between the Pasha and his brothers, who had desired that he should be confronted with them. Others say that he had formed a design of establishing a new sect, and making himself temporal as well as spiritual lord of the country. Of course a great deal more is laid to his charge than he was really guilty of. All the regular Ulema and Seyds, with Sheikh Maarooof* at their head, hated Sheikh Khaled, who, as long as his power lasted, threw them into the background.

Yusuf Bey, the brother of Khaled Bey, and governor of Pizhder, has also run away and taken refuge with Abbas Mirza, who it is said has given

* Shortly before leaving Sulimania, Mr. Rich received the following curious note from this chief of the Koordish Ulema :—

“ To the Chief of his Nation, Balyoz Bey.

“ Peace on whomsoever follows the Divine direction. For him I supplicate grace, and the guidance of God to the right path.

“ In my body is a cutaneous eruption for some months. I hope you will write me a prescription ; by the use of which I may possibly derive a cure ; and for your welfare I will pray.

“ I have also an intimate friend who is now labouring under great physical weakness. If there be a remedy for this complaint, I hope you will specify the particulars of it, that haply he may be restored to his former state. May you not cease to be guided to the service of God, and to the full possession of happiness.

“ The Suppliant,

“ MAROOOF.”

him the government of Serdesht, in addition to that of Pizhder, which he is to continue to hold under the protection of Abbas Mirza.

The Pasha has come to an open rupture with Osman Bey, and deprived him of all his governments and lands. This is no doubt the effect of a Turkish intrigue. It is thus that this unfortunate family ruins itself by dissensions, and exposes itself to the machinations of neighbouring powers, none of whom would ever be able to effect any thing against Koordistan by actual force.

The Pasha came to see me this evening for the last time. He remarked, on entering the tent, that it seemed like yesterday that he had paid me his first visit in the same place, time, and manner. I told him that, in the interval, however short it might appear to him, he had contrived to do what I never should forget for the whole remaining period of my life. He appeared more roused than the other day; probably the effort he had lately made in his quarrel with a brother who had so much power over him had stirred up his blood, and made him in some measure forget his grief. The discourse gradually fell on the state of his country and the unhappy dissensions in his family. I tried to rouse his national and family pride, but it was in vain. Sometimes there were glimmerings of enthusiasm in him, while I was touching on his ancient history and the rank which his nation might hold among the independent nations, but these were but momentary flashes. He has a great natural softness and humility of character, with something of melancholy and despondence : he has carefully cultivated the passive submission inculcated by his degrading superstition, which I cannot bear to call religion ; and I found that he had an inherent diffidence with respect to himself and his country, and an inveterate disposition to be subservient to some one. He opposed difficulties to all my arguments. At last I told him, laughing, that if he was resolved to task his ingenuity with finding out every obstacle to the improvement of his country, nothing of course was to be done ; that nevertheless I prayed God for the prosperity and strength of his family and country. He said neither could ever be strong, while so many powerful members of the family existed. I insisted it might be. "Yes," said he, "if God sent a plague among us and only left one alive." I told him, without that, I hoped it would still be, and that God might do any thing. "No doubt," said he, "God might extinguish hell fire, and yet it is certain he will not." He afterwards mentioned his wish to abdicate. I told him he was bound to fulfil the duties of the station to which God had called him. "No doubt," said he ; "yet I cannot help wondering how God was pleased to make me a governor." "For the benefit of so many thousands of people," said I. "Alas," he replied, "then what an account shall I have to give at the last day!" I disagreed with him, and said, what was really very true, that his disposition was always kind and beneficent towards every one; and that it was inseparable from the nature of all human affairs that some abuses might exist in his government, which he either was unacquainted with or could not prevent. "Listen, Bey," said he very solemnly; "man is judged by his actions, and not by his intentions. For all the abuses that have taken place in my government I alone shall have to answer before the judgment seat." Daoud Pasha has acted towards this Pasha with repeated ingratitude, treachery, and rapacity; yet he has now, by a few kind words, so completely gained him over, that he has really attached him; and Mahmood Pasha assured me that he would serve him as long as he lived. These, on the part of Mahmood Pasha, are not mere professions.

After a very interesting conversation of an hour and a half, the Pasha rose to take his leave. When he bade me adieu, his voice faltered, and his hand trembled as it pressed mine. I was equally grieved to part with him. He hopes to see me again: I fear we shall meet no more. It is hard to part even with an indifferent person for the last time, but to separate from one you esteem is bitter.

Mahmood Pasha is indeed a very estimable man, and I shall always think of him with affection. His very countenance is indicative of purity, of candour, and simplicity. I never expected to meet with such a man in the East. I fear many such are not to be met with in better climes. There is a melancholy and a tenderness in his character, which render him quite interesting. He is all feeling. The death of his son he will not readily get over, and I will confidently assert that no native of the East ever loved his wife and children as he does. Yesterday evening he went into his haram, for the first time since the late unhappy event. A child of his brother's met him and called him father. That name, and the infantine voice with which it was pronounced, were too much for him; he shrieked and fell senseless to the ground. It must be recollected that all grief is reprobated by the Mahometan religion; and excess of feeling for a woman or a child is universally despised by the followers of Islam, which preaches only apathy and sternness. The Pasha has become more really religious than any Oriental I ever knew; yet it has not made him fanatic or unfeeling. His better nature has risen above the degrading doctrines of Mahomedanism. Yet a worse man would make a better prince; and Mahmood Pasha is by no means the chief that Koordistan requires; his virtues are all those of private life. He is too mild, too confiding, and has too mean an idea of himself. Personally brave in the field, he wants the indispensable quality of civil courage. Religion and reflection have made him insensible to danger, but he has no resolution. Any one may guide him, and he is always ready to repose on any person who offers to assist him, even against his better judgment. All truth and honour himself, he has no notion of the ways of artful men, who may easily wash over their worst designs with a colour pleasing to him, and though often deceived he persists in confiding. He has the simplicity and credulity of a little child. Daoud Pasha has lately seduced his brother from him, and endeavoured to ruin him. He now finds it his interest to gain him over, which he has done by assuring him of his esteem and good intentions, and Mahmood Pasha has forgotten all that had passed.

At night Suliman Bey came to take leave of me. He is a very fine young man, and has rather more spirit and resolution than his brother. He did not talk so despondingly of Koordistan. I told him the story of the Seven years' war, to which he listened with intense interest.

This volume of my journal commenced with my arrival at Sulimania, and shall close with my departure from it. To-morrow I set out for Mousul, by the way of Altoon Kiupri, and Arbil.

I quit Koordistan with unfeigned regret. I, most unexpectedly, found in it the best people that I have ever met with in the East. I have formed friendships, and been uniformly treated with a degree of sincerity, kindness, and unbounded hospitality, which I fear I must not again look for in the course of my weary pilgrimage; and the remembrance of which will last as long as life itself endures.

APPENDIX.

APPENDIX.

I.

Fragment of a Journal from Bagdad to Sulimania, by Mrs. Rich. (Referred to in p. 3.)

April 16, 1820.—AFTER being detained by numerous visitors till twelve o'clock, I at last bade adieu to the residency, and set off to pay some farewell visits. I first went to my Koordish friend Salkha Khanum, the wife of Suliman Pasha, and she seemed not a little to envy me my excursion to her native mountains. She described to me a retreat worthy of the Ten Thousand, that, in company with her husband, she had made from Keuysanjiak to Kerman-shah over the Revend mountains, through the country of the Bulbassi Koords, a most savage independent tribe, who had been urged by the Pasha of Bagdad to attack and cut off her husband. During nearly forty days they were in the midst of one continued fight.

“Often,” to use her own words, “have I mounted my horse with balls flying about me in every direction, and whichever way I turned my head, dead and wounded lay strewed about me.” They, however, had the happiness to escape, owing to the bravery of their followers and the timely assistance of some friends. She is remarkably handsome, very feminine, and delicately made, and she formed a striking contrast to the singular adventure she was relating in so calm, modest, and unaffected a manner. I took leave of her, and proceeded to the Kiahya’s haram, to bid adieu to my constant and intimate friend Hanifa Khatoon, who was very angry at our fancy, as she called it, of flying off to such a solitary savage place as Koordistan, and leaving all the comforts and amusements of Bagdad. At sunset I parted from her with real regret, and went out to the garden of Saleh Bey, about five minutes' walk from the town, to pass the night with his mother and some other Turkish lady friends who had assembled there to take leave of me.

Mr. Rich was already gone on to the garden of Hajee Abdullah Bey, about three miles from Bagdad, where he had been invited to pass the last night; and from thence our journey fairly begins. The night was very stormy and rainy. All of us were much astonished about ten at night to see Hajee Abdullah Bey's wife walk in. She had mounted her horse, and, in the midst of all the bad weather, had come three miles in the dark purposely to pass the last evening with me.

April 17.—After getting a couple of hours' sleep, I rose by day-light, and, with unfeigned sorrow on both parts, took leave of my kind friends. Zabit Khatoon, the wife of Hajee Abdullah Bey, insisted upon accompanying me as far as the garden-house. I therefore placed her and her delightful little niece, Fatma Khanum, in my takht-revan, and, mounting my servant Taqui on a donkey, I, with Minas's mother, who accompanies me on this journey, got into the mohaffas, and we proceeded on to the Bey's garden, surrounded with my attendants on horseback. We were not, however, allowed to pass the house of our friends without dismounting and taking some refreshment. As Mr. Rich was just mounting when we arrived, and as eastern etiquette makes it indecorous for a man to appear to care anything more about his wife than the rest of his baggage, or to allow her to form part of his more stately procession,

I the more readily accepted the invitation, and had the advantage of eating a very good breakfast ere I commenced my journey, and in the mean time Mr. Rich and his party got well on their road.

About ten I fairly commenced my journey, with the prayers and kind wishes of our hospitable friends and all their household. I travel in a takht-revan, or litter, to give an idea of which I merely add, that it very much resembles a palanquin swung between two shafts before and two behind, to which are harnessed two mules. Over it is a covering of scarlet cloth, and it is ornamented at the four corners with gilt balls. My female attendants were in mohaffas, or a kind of cages, two of which are swung on one mule, and balance each other; but as Minas's mother is very stout, and poor Taqui very slender, it was a difficult and nice operation to make the balance equal by throwing in a quantity of stones on Taqui's side. It is by no means a comfortable conveyance, owing to the constrained posture the person is obliged to sit in.

We were escorted by six horsemen, besides servants and muleteers.

We arrived at our camp, near the village of Dokhala, about five o'clock. The country through which we passed was in general flat and uninteresting, but tolerably well cultivated. I observed great quantities of date-trees in every direction. The night was very stormy.

April 18.—Up at half past four in the morning, but owing to the difficulty of loading the baggage, we were not off till six. The mud was very heavy all the way, and in many places the country was quite under water. At half past eleven we pitched our camp in the bed of an old dry canal. The comfort of our journey is considerably diminished by the constant succession of heavy thunder-storms, wind, and rain which we experience. The whole afternoon was stormy and rainy. In the evening again there was a heavy squall of rain, with thunder and lightning. Our whole camp was under water. The night, however, cleared up, the moon shone bright, and everything promised fine weather, when, about midnight, we were awakened by a violent storm of wind, rain, thunder, and lightning, which lasted until morning, and completely drenched the tents and everything they contained, which was a very great trial to my patience.

April 19.—The whole country was in such a state, and our tents and baggage so heavy and unmanageable from the wet, that we were obliged to remain stationary. The day was very stormy, and the wind variable. To add to our luxuries, the ground on which we were encamped was full of scorpions; and let it be remembered, the ground is our only seat. Every body seemed out of humour at this succession of stormy weather, it being so very unusual in this climate. The afternoon cleared up; but the night was again very pitiless, the heavy violent rain and incessant thunder and lightning seemed as if altogether they would crush us under our tents. I sat up most of the night in considerable alarm, and at length lay down on my bed without undressing.

April 20.—Our situation is really very melancholy. The whole country, as far as the eye can reach, is one sheet of water, and there is no village to which we can retreat within three hours of our camp; besides which, there is a scarcity of provisions; our people are exposed to all the fury of the storm; and we ourselves are not much better off. We can neither go backwards nor forwards, and here we must remain.

The morning seemed inclined to clear up; but soon after mid-day the black clouds again began to gather, the distant thunder to roll, and at length it once more burst over our heads, and we were again drenched with rain. I never felt more exhausted and disheartened than at this time, and every body looked so worn out, that, with the exception of Mr. Rich, all seemed to have lost every grain of power to bear up under this determined persevering, crushing, storm. Again it held out hopes of clearing up; but about two the storm began to gather more frightfully than ever from the north-west. The horizon became awfully black; one continued roll of thunder, with vivid and incessant lightning, high wind, all gradually coming nearer and nearer, and louder and louder, seemed to portend really something very terrific. The wind increased, the whole sky was covered over, and apparently surcharged with tempests; the thunder increased all around us, and we seemed shut up as it were in universal destruction, when all at once mercy was shown us, and with a few smart showers this overwhelming mass burst and spent its violence somewhere to the west of us; after which the weather cleared up most beautifully, and though the wind continued in the north-east, or stormy quarter, we entertained hopes of being able to march to-morrow.

In the evening, which was remarkably clear and very pleasant, we strolled out along the bed of an old canal, in which our tents stood.

April 21.—A fine morning, of which we were very glad to avail ourselves to move from our dismal quarters. We were up by half past four; and after eating our breakfast, we went and stood upon a little mount in the neighbourhood of our camp, to look on while the people were loading. At six all was ready, and I got into my takht-revan not without some fears for our progress through the mud and morass that lay before us. We got on, however, pretty well, owing to the extreme care of the Pasha's Oda Bashi, or head tent-pitcher, and his experienced and attentive people. Some canals, over which were bad bridges, rendered slippery by the mud, gave us a good deal of trouble, for the mud was certainly worse than anything I had imagined, and it seemed at times as if it were impossible for the people and animals to get through it. To add to our discouragements, as we set off it began to rain; but after a while, a strong south-east breeze drove away the rain, and pretty well cleared the heavens. Poor Minas's mother was in dreadful alarm the whole way, and yet, much as I pitied her, I could not refrain at times from laughing; there was something so irresistibly comic in her countenance and expressions of deep despair, in the prospect of her poor beast, and uncomfortable conveyance, rolling with her in the mud.

We reached Tchubook at ten, where our tents were pitched for the day. After taking some refreshment I lay down to rest for an hour, and on awakening was sorry to hear distant thunder, and to see heavy clouds collecting in the west. We are yet in suspense whether or not it will burst over us, or pass away to the south. We have heard here that at Bagdad it has rained for three days and three nights. After continued and incessant lightning from all quarters of the heavens, and black masses of clouds collecting in every direction, had kept us in alarm for the space of nearly three hours, for we watched every sign with as much anxiety as those in the ark could have done, one moment pronouncing it had passed to the west, another hoping we should only get the end of it,—all our hopes and fears were put to an end about half past ten, when a most violent thunder-storm, accompanied with a storm of wind from the south-east, burst over our heads most pitilessly. I really lay trembling till near morning, every moment not knowing what might happen; and, at least, expecting to be drenched, or to have the tent down upon us. It was indeed a most Byronic night.

April 22.—The appearance at day-light was that of a decided settled winter's rain, which of course put an end to all hope of moving one step on our journey to-day. Such a season has never either been witnessed, or even heard of in these climates. At this time of the year, summer is generally considered as begun; and many people at Bagdad are by this time moved up to their terraces to sleep.

Continued heavy rain all day, not unlike a bleak dismal rainy day in England. Were we but near a town of any description, we might make an effort to get under dry covering; but alas! there is none within ten or fifteen hours of our encampment.

April 23.—A fine clear night, which put everybody into good spirits, though distant lightning to the north-east was occasionally still visible. The morning, however, had again assumed her leaden mantle and threatened rain. A north-west wind gave us hopes of its clearing away; which however had not strength, and the south-easter got the better of it. The light horsemen of our party hurried off as speedily as possible to avoid the menacing rain; and about half past six I set off in the takht-revan, followed by the heavy baggage. We passed many ruins on the road between Tchubook and Delli Abbas, chiefly consisting of rather considerable mounds. We were obliged to go out of our road, and to keep towards the Diala, on account of the water which had lodged in the low grounds all about. The Koordish mountains were visible, extending to a great distance to the east of us.

At ten we arrived at Delli Abbas, on the Khalis canal; it is now only the remains of a village. Villages were visible in every direction about us, but none exactly in our road.

Some peasants belonging to the neighbouring village of Adana Keuy tell us they have had eight days' incessant rain ; that the whole country is under water. They were much alarmed on Tuesday night by the passage of three fire-balls, or meteors, coming rapidly from the west, and going towards the Hamreen mountains.

We pitched our camp on a dry spit of sand, near the bridge over the canal. Our general direction to-day has been northerly. The day very cloudy and threatening, blowing very hard from the south-east until mid-day, after which we had light west airs. The evening was cloudy, with lightning to the south-west ; but, upon the whole, the weather seems improving.

April 24.—As we had an unusually long stage before us to-day, we were all up by four. The gentlemen mounted at half past five ; but the heavy part of the establishment, the takht-revan, the baggage, and tents, did not get off before six. It was a fine clear morning, with a north-west wind. We reached the foot of the hills, dignified by the natives with the name of the Hamreen mountains, a little after seven, by which time Minas's mother was in a perfect agony, and seemed really to believe that her last hour was come. No adventurer on Chimborazo, Mont Blanc, or Himalaya could have a higher idea of his own prowess and courage than she, when she found herself safe over this low ridge of rocks. I mounted my horse in order to relieve the mules in the takht-revan, and by way of variety to myself ; my suite kept at a little distance behind me, that I might ride with my veil up, and thus, escorted by Minas only, I began ascending the hills.

Wherever we have crossed this curious and interminable range, whether at the pass in the direct road from Delli Abbas to Kara Tepeh, which at this season of the year is impassable, on account of the marshes in its neighbourhood, at this pass which we were now going through, or at another which is made by the Tigris near Mousul, we have observed that all the southern face is composed of sandstone in a recumbent posture, inclining towards the north, the northern face being composed of sand and pebbles.

The view from the summit of the hills, though not rivaling that from the top of the Jura, was still very agreeable to one who loves anything at all approaching to the picturesque, and who has so long been deprived of every thing of the kind. The green fields, the distant villages, the fertilizing Diala winding through the plain, and above all, the distant mountains, were a most grateful novelty, and humble as this landscape was, it quite affected me. After descending the hill on horseback, and resting for a little, I again got into my carriage a little before ten.

At twenty minutes after ten, we crossed the bed of a little pebbly trout stream, now almost dry, which delighted me as being the first of the kind I have seen for many a year.

At half past twelve we arrived at the bridge of the Nareen river, where we found Gabriel the Kahvajee or coffee-maker waiting for us, left behind by Mr. Rich, to prepare us a cup of coffee, which we found most refreshing, for we were all rather wearied, and flagged from the heat of the sun, added to which Minas's mother was quite exhausted by terror.

After a few minutes' halt, we again set off for the village of Kara Tepeh, which, though only reckoned an hour and a half from the bridge, we did not reach until half past two, owing to the late rains having rendered a swampy, nitrous soil almost impassable. On my arrival I joined Claude and Mr. Bellino in a garden, where I found them stretched on the ground under an orange tree, and regaling themselves with sour milk.

Kara Tepeh is peopled by Turcomans. There is a Tekia or Convent of Kaderi dervishes at this place, which is probably very ancient, a celebrated Sultan of Bokhara being buried here, who retired to this spot in the time of the Abasside Caliphs.

In the evening while dinner was preparing, and I was resting, the gentlemen went out to take a walk, and Mr. Rich accidentally made rather a curious discovery. To the left of the village, he had remarked a mount or hill on which he had wished to have pitched our tent, but had been restrained by observing it was a burying place. It had every appearance of being artificial, but the circumstance of the Mahometans burying their dead here, and still more, performing the Friday prayer here, rendered the conjecture improbable. However, upon digging, to the great surprise of every one, urns with bones were discovered in every direction, and fully proved it to be an artificial mount and an ancient burying place, similar to those which we had observed at Babylon and Seleucia.

At the opposite end of the village is another mount, which appears to have been a castle.

The people hereabouts are much afflicted with bad eyes, in the same way as at Bagdad, and the women were continually coming to my women-servants and beseeching them to ask me for Frenk Sheker, or European sugar, (by which they mean lump sugar,) a sovereign remedy for the eyes all over the east.

At two P.M. thermometer 90° in the takht-revan.

April 25.—Up as usual a little after four. It was a fine clear fresh morning, with a gentle north-west air. While sitting on my carpet under a tree, waiting to be summoned to my takht-revan, and as soon as the gentlemen moved off, many of the ladies of the village collected about me. One poor woman was in very great distress owing to a most barbarous and horrible transaction that had just taken place in her family. Her only daughter had been married some time ago to her cousin, and lately, by common consent, a divorce took place, as is very common amongst the lower class of Mahometans. The man soon after married another person, and the girl followed his example ; when, dreadful to relate, her former husband murdered her without assigning any reason. The wretched mother wishes to go to Bagdad, and to throw herself at the feet of the Pasha, but dares not, as the monster has vowed to pursue and murder her also, if she stirs a step. She has no husband, nor any other relations to assist her, except an only son, a boy, who however endeavours to console her, promising, as soon as he is grown up, to revenge his sister.

At six we set off from Kara Tepeh ; the country was generally barren, and composed of ranges of low hills, running parallel to each other, and crossing our road, occasionally intersected with broad beds of torrents now mostly dry ; the soil was stony and gravelly.

At twenty minutes after eight we reached a small rivulet meandering through a marshy plain, and the course of which was only to be distinguished by the great mass of reeds growing to a great height, that quite choked the stream. We crossed it by rather a pretty little bridge, and continued our journey through a low pasture country, over which were spread Arab tents, and sheep and cattle were grazing.

A little before ten we came to a shallow muddy stream, the banks of which were very high, and much cut up by the rain, and over which there was no bridge, so that we encountered considerable difficulty and even danger in getting through it. The takht-revan was very nearly dashed down the bank into the mud ; I was much shaken, and not a little alarmed. I heard a scream from Annai Khatoon (Minas's mother) who expected to see me dashed to pieces, but owing to the strength and activity of the muleteers, I was extricated without any accident.

We arrived at Kifri at twelve, and found very comfortable accommodation prepared for us at the house of a Turkish gentleman farmer, formerly a man of great wealth, but now reduced almost to beggary by the oppression of the Turkish government. Not long before we left Bagdad, Mr. Rich got him out of prison and persuaded the Pasha to forgive him a debt of a thousand piastres which he owed government.

Not fifteen years ago, the village of Kara Tepeh contained seven hundred houses, and now consists of about seventy-five. Most of the inhabitants have been forced to take refuge in Bagdad, from the oppression of their governors. The same may be said of all the villages in this and in every other Pashalik of the Turkish empire.

April 26.—A day of rest for the people and mules. After breakfast we set off on horseback to examine some curious ruins which had been discovered by Mr. Rich yesterday in his evening walk, about ten minutes from the village and in the bed of the torrent.

We found the shemsia (a small tent) pitched, our carpets spread, and Mahmood already diligently employed in digging. We dispatched Mr. Bellino to examine some other ruins at a little distance, and to report if they were worth the trouble of going to see. We soon laid open a small chamber, the walls of which were composed of loose stones laid together very coarsely, but faced with plaster covered with ornaments, in compartments, some of them really in very good taste. (See the following cut.) The floor seemed to have been plain stucco, as well as the ceiling, which was painted in fresco with ornaments of flowers, or arabesques, the outlines being black, and filled up with a bright red. This latter circumstance rather puzzled us, as we did not recollect ever hearing of any ancient Persian building with this Grecian ornament.

A Pannel of one of the sides of the Room in the Sassanian Ruin at Kifri.

We laid open this chamber, with its door, very perfect, and part of another, in a less perfect condition. From the appearance of the ground, these appear to form part of a range of very small rooms—or they may be almost called cells—extending a short way W. S. W. and E. N. E., of which there seem to be traces of five or six. The north side seems supported or strengthened by small round buttresses. In the first and by far the most curious chamber, we dug up some pieces of a black substance, like charcoal, but we looked in vain for an inscription, or even a coin.

We afterwards walked towards the banks of the torrent, and came to a very high mound, which has evidently been eaten into by the water, and at first sight almost deceives the eye with the idea that it is the natural bank: however, upon a little careful inspection, we soon perceived it to be artificial, and of a square figure. Upon digging, the peasants continually discover bones and earthen jars, some of which we saw. They were very coarse, varnished black in the inside, and resembling those discovered at Selencia and Babylon. Some coins have also been dug out here; but unfortunately they were immediately melted down by the peasants. On the top of the mound and, indeed, all along under the hills, as far as opposite to Kifri, traces of very considerable buildings are visible. The torrent must have changed, and never could have run in its present course at the time this town flourished, the principal ruins being exactly in the middle of its bed. It is more probable that the torrent, which is now allowed to take its own course, was confined to a bed, and turned to the service of agriculture.

On the other or west bank are also considerable ruins, which have very much the appearance of having formed part of the city walls. It seems probable that these are Persian and, most likely, Sassanian remains. But what place this may have been it would be very difficult to determine, owing to the little information we possess, out of the Roman line, of the Sassanian monarchy, which, from all we have observed in various directions, seems to have been most flourishing, and to have contained great cities within a few miles of each other, and an immense population. Farther up the torrent are some excavations in the rock, called Ghiaour houses, or the houses of the infidels; as indeed all ruins are called by the natives; by which they mean, all who preceded Mahometans.

Mr. Bellino discovered, at about twenty minutes' ride from the southern extremity of the ruins, and in the hills, some excavated sepulchral chambers, with very small doors, and inside of which were places of very small dimensions, for laying out bodies. They much resembled the excavations at Nakshi Rustum, but there was no inscription or carving of any description. Still farther on, at about three miles from the ruins, on the top of a hill, are vestiges of a building, which is called Kiz Kalassi, or the Girl's Castle. There also bones and urns are discovered.

A man from the Pasha of Sulimania, who met us at this place, sent by his master to know at what part of his frontier he was to send a mehmandar to meet us, and welcome us into Koordistan, set off to-day to inform the Pasha that we had decided upon taking the Kara Hassan road, and not that of Ibrahim Khanjee, on account of the former being the easiest, and not making above a couple of days' difference in our journey.

April 27.—I was too unwell to admit either of our continuing our journey to-day, or of my accompanying the gentlemen on another ruin-hunting expedition, at a place called Eski Kifri, about two hours off, and where they really had the good fortune to discover even more interesting and extensive remains than those of yesterday, though much in the same style. Wherever they dug, bones and ruins appeared. What a population must this now thinly inhabited country formerly have possessed!

Some Arsacian, Sassanian, and Cufic coins, with a Roman intaglio and a Sassanian one, on which was a most perfect inscription, were brought us by the natives. The latter may throw some light upon these ruins.

The day was very hot and oppressive, the wind being south-east. The mother of Mahmood, Pasha of Sulimania, is expected here to-morrow, on her way to Bagdad, where, it is said, she is going to negotiate a peace with Daoud Pasha. She is accompanied to the Turkish frontier by her youngest son Osman Bey. They are coming by the segerma or straight road, over the mountain, by Ibrahim Khanjee ; but we understand they have been obliged to keep about a thousand peasants employed in clearing the way before them, which would otherwise have been impassable. We have no reason therefore to regret our determination of taking an easier, even though it be a longer, road in entering Koordistan.

April 28.—We left Kifri at six, the children of the village following, and smothering us with roses. We crossed a range of gravelly hills, proceeding from those of Kifri, and joining the hills we had crossed on coming from Bagdad, the only interruption being the Kifri torrent, which has opened for itself a passage into the valley of Tchemen, through which passage, a wide and gradual one, Mr. Rich rode yesterday to Eski Kifri.

Soon after eight we quitted the hills, and came into the large and finely cultivated plain occupied by the Beiats, a tribe of Turcomans who emigrated thus far from Khorassan.

About half-past eight we crossed a small stream, and were much pleased with the scene around us. The whole country in every direction was covered with corn ; some still green—some half ripe—some actually reaping. Men and women were thus employed, but seemed to work in a very lazy manner : and they were cutting down the corn with a little crooked knife, such as a gardener in England uses for pruning his garden.

At half-past eleven we arrived at the principal encampment of the Beiats, near which was a ruined village. Here we expected to halt for the day, and to find the rest of the party waiting for us ; but, to our great astonishment, there were no signs of them, which puzzled us a good deal, it having been agreed in the morning, before starting, that it would be best to make two days' journey between Kifri and Toozkhoormattee, and to stop at this encampment. However, I quickly comprehended that Claude had, on coming to the camp, which was situated on low marshy ground, and seeing the weather very unsettled, thought it more prudent to push on at once for Toozkhoormattee, where he knew the comfortable house of his friend Omar Bey was prepared for us, and which was much more agreeable than passing the night under tents.

I stated my conviction to Minas, who made it known to the rest of the party, and it was unanimously agreed I was likely to be in the right, and that we had nothing to do but to make the best of our way on to Toozkhoormattee. I rejoiced at the step our fore-runners had taken, as I believe did most of our people, with the exception of the Oda Bashi, or head of the tent-pitchers, and his muleteers, who grumbled much all the rest of the stage.

At two we came to the torrent that passes by the village of Toozkhoormattee, called the Ak Soo, coming down from the Koordish mountains at Ibrahim Khanjee. Owing to the late rains it was very full; but the peasants pointing out to us a good ford, we passed it very easily; and, after winding for some time through very beautiful lanes, formed by the gardens, the olive, apricot, and orange-trees hanging over our heads, loaded with fruit and flowers, and inhabited by thousands of doves, murmuring in their soft melancholy tone of voice, we reached Omar Bey's very nice new house at half-past two, with very considerable pleasure; for I felt very much tired, and I did indeed enjoy the comfortable sofa and fine fruit which Claude had busied himself in preparing for me.

We came in sight again to-day of the Hamreen hills, for the first time since crossing them at Delli Abbas.

April 29.—As we intend remaining here for a day or two, to rest the animals, the gentlemen set off this morning to visit some naphtha-springs which lie in the opening made by the torrent, through the hills, to the south-east of the village.

We were surprised to hear that about midnight an officer of the Pasha of Sulimania had arrived, with a most polite letter from his master to Mr. Rich ; but he had had so long a ride in pursuit of us that he reached Toozkhoormattee quite exhausted, and he was still asleep when Minas reported his arrival, nor did he awake till near noon. He proved to be the Pasha's Master of the Ceremonies. He came from Ibrahim Khanjee, expecting to find us at Kifri ; from thence he pursued us to the Beiat encampment ; and from the tents he came on here, without taking any rest ; in consequence of which, he and his horse were completely exhausted, having performed a journey of eighteen hours : nine from Ibrahim Khanjee to Kifri ; nine from Kifri here ; and as three miles to an hour is the common reckoning throughout the East, he had ridden his poor horse fifty-four miles.

Several Tartars from Constantinople are reported to be approaching ; and we hope they may arrive before we turn out of the Bagdad road.

We hear from Bagdad that the two fugitive rebels, Jossem and Sadok Beys, it is expected, will accept their pardon and return. The latter, however, insists upon Mr. Rich becoming his security. He can trust nobody else, he says ; but that if the Balios Bey (Mr. Rich) will pledge his word for his safety, he will return immediately to his allegiance without doubt or fear. This, however, is quite out of the question, as the government will of course require Mr. Rich to be answerable for the good conduct of this young man, who offers, it is true, to bind himself by any oath Mr. Rich shall require; but as the poor young man cannot trust the word of his own countrymen, neither can Mr. Rich trust him, however solemn an oath he may bind himself by. We had melancholy experience in this respect, in the case of this very young man's elder brother, the late Saed Pasha, for whom Mr. Rich was obliged to become security to save his life. He swore on the Koran, in the presence of the Pasha, the Prime Minister, Mr. Rich, and others, that he would never attempt to run away from Bagdad; and yet very shortly after, he actually did run away, escaped, set himself up in rebellion, became Pasha, and murdered the very man who had spared his life and property at the intercession of Mr. Rich.

In the afternoon there was a very heavy squall of thunder and lightning, accompanied with rain and wind from the south-east. The thermometer, which at mid-day was 71° , fell suddenly to 64° ; and it became extremely cold. The evening was stormy and cold.

April 30.—Claude very poorly from a violent bilious attack, and obliged to keep quiet.

The morning was bright and clear, with a pleasant north-west wind; but in the afternoon clouds again collected, and there was a slight shower of rain and distant thunder. The weather at Bagdad seems to have been just as unsettled and stormy as with us. It poured with rain for one whole day and night, and rendered the streets quite impassable.

Claude continued ill all day, and towards evening he became so much worse, that I begged he would give up all idea of moving to-morrow.

May 1.—Mr. Rich had a pretty tranquil night, and the day being remarkably fine, and he anxious to get us all across the torrent of Taook, before any more rain falls, which may render it impassable, he thought it more advisable for us to quit Toozkhoormattee.

As usual, I and my party did not set off until half an hour after the gentlemen, who mounted at six, with a most beautiful morning, which helped to revive my dear husband.

I rather suspect the village of Toozkhoormattee, though so extremely pretty, is very unhealthy, owing perhaps to the great quantity of rice grown. It was not till our arrival here that Claude was taken so very seriously ill. I felt myself very far from well, and all our people complained.

Soon after we had bid adieu to deceitful Toozkhoormattee, we overtook a party of delli domans, or Turkish strolling buffoons and singers. They were a most ludicrous group, and by their appearance alone excited the general mirth of our party. There were seven or eight of them, all mounted on very small half-starved looking donkeys; they were very ragged and lean themselves, and one, who seemed the chief merry Andrew, had on his head an old kaouk*, with the cotton sticking out of it, and was mounted on so very small an animal, that he all but walked, his legs being not much more than a couple of inches from the ground. Ali Aga and the Oda Bashi dashed out and challenged him to play the spear or jereed with them, made his animal run away with him, knocked off his kaouk, and played every kind of gambol with him, to the great diversion of the lookers on.

About half past seven we were obliged to halt to change the mules in my takht-revan, which had become so very restless and disagreeable, that there was no bearing them any longer. A little before nine we crossed one torrent, the bed of which was dry; and about nine we passed another, with a little stream of water in it, clear as crystal, and running over a bed of pebbles. The Kifri and Tooz-khoormattee, very ugly hills, were on our right, but being at a great distance, were less offensive to the eye than hitherto. The Hamreen hills were again visible on our left.

* A cap quilted with cotton, and worn by all gentlemen and officers belonging to government in Turkey.

As we advanced, the country became less cultivated, but abounded in fine pasturage. The road was more diversified with travellers, both men, women, and children, than we have seen since we left Bagdad.

At length, about noon, to the horror and dismay of Minas's mother, who neither ate nor slept last night from fear of it, we reached the formidable Taook Tchai, or torrent, which rises in Koordistan, a little to the right of our proposed journey. In the summer it is chiefly used for irrigation; in the autumn there is not above a foot and a half of water, as we know by experience, having passed it in Oct. 1813, on our journey to Constantinople. The time of its fury and danger is in winter and spring, after the sudden and heavy rains in the mountains, when it must indeed be appalling, filling its whole bed, which is more than half a mile broad, rushing with the greatest vehemence, and bringing down with it large stones. The rise is sometimes so sudden as to surprise travellers half-way over, so that altogether poor Annai Khatoon's fears were not groundless. We found it much less formidable than we expected; and accompanied by the zabit of the village, and a party of the villagers going before us with a band of music to show us the way over the best ford, we crossed without any accident. The water had fallen much since yesterday, when its rise had been so sudden as to overtake a shepherd and his flock, who were rescued with some difficulty. In the bed of the torrent were two streams; the first was about two and a half feet deep, and ten yards broad; the second was about three and a half feet deep, and between twenty and thirty yards broad,—very rapid and very difficult to cross, owing to the bad footing for the animals on the large round loose stones. At five minutes past twelve we had safely cleared this long dreaded torrent, called the Taook Tchai by the natives, the Gorgus of Ptolemy, the Physcus of Xenophon, and the Odorneh of D'Anville.

At half past two we reached Taook, and were very comfortably lodged,—much to my surprise, for the village itself had a miserable appearance. It is situated in a fertile, well watered plain; and, from the vast ruins scattered about in every direction, must formerly have been a very considerable city. The remains, however, are all of the age of the Caliphs, who, by-the-by, seem to have been just as enlightened and humane governors as any of their predecessors, and the country to have been as well peopled and flourishing as in the days of the Semiramises, the Chosroes, &c. Taook, or Dakouk, in the thirteenth century, was the seat of a Chaldean bishopric, which implies a considerable Christian population. The remains of what they call a church are still to be seen.

May 2.—I passed a restless uncomfortable night, sleep only bringing frightful dreams, which rendered wakefulness itself preferable. About daylight I fell asleep; and on awaking, I was surprised to hear no sounds of preparation for setting off. The people seemed much inclined to be lazy, and to pass the day here, saying it was cloudy, and might rain: but we were inexorable. The season is advancing, and by much delay, we might find ourselves overtaken by the heat before we get out of the plains. In the immediate neighbourhood of burnt up Bagdad, travelling after eight in the morning would at this season be quite out of the question.

I am sorry to say we now leave the post-road, as you will understand, if you remember anything of our former journey to Constantinople. We now lose our last chance of meeting the Tartars, said to be near at hand with an express packet for us. Mr. Rich wished to leave orders with the postmaster at Taook, to send the Tartar straight from hence to Sulimania, but found that, without express orders from the government at Bagdad, no horses would be furnished by the villages. Besides which, our suspicious, timid governor, Daoud Pasha, might choose to combine the arrival of the Tartar from Constantinople with our journey into Koordistan, which, even as it is, he does not much like. No Turk ever takes a journey for amusement or health; he may make these excuses, but he has always some secret unacknowledged purpose in view, and he cannot believe any one who professes to travel only for pleasure; and as Daoud Pasha piques himself on his power of deceiving others, he is made uneasy at any step taken by another person, which if he does not believe the alleged reason for, he thinks may conceal something under it inimical to him. He is suspicious of everybody, and believes nobody; and I am sorry to be obliged to say he is suspected by everybody, and believed by no one.

Thus am I obliged, I own with a very ill grace, to wait many days ere I shall see the beloved Mardocks post-mark; and in what a place shall I receive letters written by the most amiable, accomplished, and beloved inhabitants of that pleasant retirement in the most refined and happiest country in the world! Oh that I could convey to you an idea of the barbarous, burning land we are in! Love your dear England!

We set off at twenty minutes after six, travelling for some time through very heavy mud and fine corn-fields, till eight o'clock, when we reached a village at the foot of a long range of low hills, called at this place Matara, but a continuation, I believe, of those at Kifri. We wound through a defile paved with sandstone, a pretty stream running through it, and immense blocks lying scattered about in every direction. There was considerable difficulty in dragging the takht-revan through some very narrow and slippery passes. The poor mules were slipping and sliding about most disagreeably, and sometimes seemed kept from falling only by main force. After scrambling up through the pass, there lay before us one sea of hideous bare sandstone hills, as far as the eye could reach, without any other verdure than here and there patches of corn.

We continued ascending and descending over this mass of crumbling stone and gravel for nearly two hours, and reached the plain of Leilan at ten. As far as the eye could reach in every direction nothing but fields of barley were to be seen, some yet green, others almost ripe. This sight excited the raptures of the poor Bagdadees among our party, who would hardly have believed the world could have contained such a sight. Such an expanse of green they had never before beheld!

A little after eleven we reached the village of Leilan (which is about five hours from Kerkook), where we found a hut already cleared of its inhabitants and made ready for our reception. This village belongs to Abdulla Effendi, formerly Muttawelli of Imaum Aazem, with whose family at Bagdad I am well acquainted. He is at present himself here, and sent us a present of five fine fresh cheeses, some admirable butter, and sour milk or yoghourt, or rather clotted sour cream, for I do not know exactly how to describe it; but it is one of the very best milk preparations I know, and I can assure you we made a very luxurious tiffin, or, as I suppose you all by this time call it, luncheon, upon this present of the hospitable Effendi. Our lodging, it must be owned, was very miserable, but it was the best that the village afforded, the poor inhabitants of which complained bitterly of want of protection against the border marauders, by whom they are continually attacked and plundered, this being so very near the Koordish frontier.

They are only just beginning to recover from the effects of an inroad made last year by the Persian army, who took away everything they could carry, and burnt the rest.

The whole country are praying that our visit to Koor-distan may be of good augury and keep everything tranquil. I heartily hope it may : it is pleasant to usher in peace, and to be forerunners of good.

May 3.—We were very glad to escape from our dirty lodgings, and I to get into my takht-revan from the midst of a crowd of very troublesome masculine-looking women, who surrounded me the moment my dear husband mounted his horse and left me. They dare not come near me as long he was there, though they were dying of curiosity to get a peep at me.

We set off at about half-past five, and had one of the pleasantest day's journeys I have known for a long time, over green hills and through fertile valleys, the pretty mountain stream of the Leilan meeting us every now and then : its pure waters gurgled over its pebbly bed, its banks were bedecked with trees and flowers of all descriptions, and enlivened by the sweet notes of hundreds of birds, among which the lark and the thrush, those well-known sweet voices of another and a better land, affected me very powerfully. Added to all this, the freshness of the air, the novelty of the lovely scene, and the amazement of our people, altogether assured us we really had at length reached another region, and were quitting the dreary, parched up, melancholy plains of Bagdad, where the very sight of extensive green is unwelcome to the traveller, as it can only be produced by the overflowings of the river Tigris, or the canals which intersect the country, and is consequently marshy, wet, and unwholesome.

For the first hour of our stage we proceeded up the banks of the pretty Leilan, covered with mulberry, pomegranate, a kind of dwarf poplar, willow, and other trees; besides that in many places the ground looked dyed with the quantities of roses, that perfumed the air.

Soon after nine we arrived at the tents of Yusuf Aga, in the valley of Leilan, a Georgian slave of the Pasha of Bagdad and governor of this district, called Kara Hassan. He is an old friend of Mr. Rich's, and most hospitably insisted upon entertaining the whole of our not very small party.

A tent for us was pitched on a little elevation above my favorite river, which winding and meandering over its pebbly bed, through little bosquets of fig trees, mulberry trees, and rose bushes, together with the gentle green swelling bank on the opposite side, the extremely fresh appearance of everything around us, altogether made me very pathetic, as Claude called it, while he tried, though very unsuccessfully, to conceal how very, very much he sympathized with me. But from our very long privation of such a prospect it appeared like enchantment, and affected us more than the many celebrated spots we had visited in either England, Switzerland, or Italy. We rambled about the valley and through the beautiful grove, gathering roses and wild flowers, till suddenly we came to a wild rose bush, for which everything else was abandoned, and we almost worshipped the solitary exile, as it seemed, from England.

In the afternoon Mrs. Yusuf Aga paid me a visit most carefully veiled, and she came creeping to my tent from under the wall of the tent, that no one might see her. She has learned this scrupulosity since her marriage to a Turk, I suppose, for she herself is an Arab, to whom it is not usual. As soon as I got rid of my visitor, we set off wandering about again, and were quite sorry when want of light and strength obliged us to retreat to our tent.

May 4.—The morning was bitterly cold and very trying to our poor Bagdadees. We set off at six, our road still continuing in the valley and along the banks of the Leilan water, which we occasionally crossed. The valley became narrower and grew more beautiful, the river at times hid by the thick wood through which it found its way. At times we were embosomed in trees, and often rode through coppices of mulberry, fig, pomegranate, poplar, willow, and other trees, and in the midst of quantities of flowers, so that altogether the scene had the appearance of the approach to a gentleman's country-house. After passing over green hills and crossing little rills almost at every step, we at length reached a plain, beyond which the mountains of Koordistan lay before us. On our right hand was a little ziyaret, or place of pilgrimage, called Kidder Elias, for a considerable space round which it is forbidden to hunt, and the game is under the special protection of the saint.

Soon after eleven we arrived at the end of our stage for this day at Tchemtchemal, an artificial mount of at least 200 feet high, situated in the midst of a fine extensive green plain, surrounded by the mountains of Koordistan, from Keuysanjiak to Seghirmeh, the high and still snowy summit of Pir Omar Goodroon towering above all the rest, just in front of us.

We scrambled up the mount, which is very steep and of extent sufficient to have held another such camp as ours. It is a most remarkable object; and perhaps from hence some of the most ancient Persian kings, Cyrus or Xerxes, may have surveyed their armies in the plain below; while at the moment I am writing, a company of Indians, in the English uniform, with drums and fifes, are parading on the very same spot, and marching to a Scotch tune!

May 5.—As a relief to the mules, and to escape the shaking of the takht-revan over what is reckoned a troublesome road, I, nothing loth, mounted my horse about half-past five. We soon left the takht-revan, baggage, and kajavahs far behind us, and proceeded at a very pleasant pace, when not hindered by the heavy mud, which we met with every now and then in the deep ravines, formed by innumerable rills, coming in every direction over a thick red soil of almost a crimson colour.

We had a fine view of a part of the chain of Zagros to the north, covered with snow, called the Kandeel Dagh, and apparently very near us, though, in fact, ten days' journey off, in the country of the Bulbassis, on the frontiers of Persia. A little before nine we dismounted to wait for the baggage, and sat down by the side of a little brook. We waited here near an hour, and then mounted again much refreshed. After crossing some low rocky hills, we arrived through heavy mud at the pass of Derbend, a narrow opening through a high precipitous bare ridge of rock. This pass was fortified by the late Abdurrahman, the father to the present Pasha of Sulimania, who indeed fortified all the passes from Koordistan into Turkey and Persia, under a favorite idea of his of gradually freeing his dominions from subjection to either of these powers, which might be easily accomplished under a man of talent, who could succeed in uniting all his dependent chiefs and the members of his clan. In the year 1808, the Pasha of Bagdad attacked this fort, but in vain, nor could he have succeeded in forcing his way into Koordistan, had not a Koordish chief, one of Abdurrahman's own family, who was hostile to his tribe and had taken refuge with the Turks, led the party over a pass considered unattackable, which thus came unexpectedly upon Abdurrahman's army, defeated it and obliged him to fly, and marched upon and took the capital. Abdurrahman, upon this most unexpected defeat, tore his beard, wept, and foamed at the mouth with rage and disappointment, exclaiming, "While I am doing my utmost to liberate my country, one of my own family betrays it!" He was carried off the field of battle by main force.

A little after eleven we arrived at the village of Derghezeen, lying at the entrance of a very fine plain, which is said to be infested with serpents, and as our tent was pitched in a field of long grass, this was very unpleasant news to us.

We remarked here another mound exactly similar to the one on which we encamped yesterday: it is called Gopara.

I was a good deal startled in the evening by the sight of a large centipede which ran rapidly over the carpet on which we were sitting. Had my bed been on the ground I should not have been able to rest after such a sight, but thanks to my comfortable little English travelling bedstead, and being very tired, I slept most soundly, and was disturbed neither by serpents nor centipedes.

May 6.—We were up by four o'clock, and again I had the enjoyment of riding my pleasant pony. We mounted at half-past five, a very heavy dew falling. We rode through very heavy mud over a fine plain, bounded on all sides by low bare hills, with here and there villages and patches of cultivation: the plain itself seems to consist chiefly of pasturage.

We have now fairly entered Koordistan, are surrounded on all sides by its mountains, no other language than Koordish is understood. We already observe a very marked difference of countenance between the tribe and peasant Koords; the characteristic of the former being eyes far apart, nose aquiline, and forehead broad: their persons are large and well proportioned, and they have a very military air. The peasant has a most regular Grecian countenance, with a softer, more agreeable eye and expression than the tribesmen; but he is neither so tall, nor has he so open and independent a deportment as the other: this latter circumstance, however, may easily be accounted for—the one being lord, and the other the slave.

After winding round a range of hills that divide this plain, and riding for some time through a marshy bad road, we came close under the mountains and hills that lay between us and the plain of Sulimania, and continued our way along a fine dry road, crossing, at almost every quarter of an hour, rills of clear, cold, beautiful water. The peasants were ploughing up, in many directions, a stubborn, stony soil on the sides of the mountains, while the well-watered, fertile, and easily to be cultivated plain was left in the quiet possession of every kind of weed.

At eight we halted for a little while on the side of a hill. The ground before us was enamelled with every kind of flower, and there was an agreeable aromatic odour from quantities of wild sage, thyme, &c. Opposite to us, on the other side of the plain, in the hills, were some prettily-situated villages, with a few scattered trees, which were a pleasant sight to us, the great defect of these mountains and plains being their bareness of wood. Not far from us was the tent of the Master of the Horse of Abdulla Pasha, whose horses were scattered about grazing.

After refreshing poor Annai Khatoon with a cup of coffee, we again mounted at forty-five minutes past eight, and went on very pleasantly till we approached a steep, stony hill, when the mud had become quite intolerable from the large stones in it, over and against which our poor horses were tumbling and sinking between, so as to make one doubt they ever could get through. But even this was better than the road we found ourselves in, upon ascending the hills; sometimes over rocks and large loose stones, sometimes thick heavy mud; at other times dried mud, which was as bad as the wet; now up, now down; altogether, I think, it was by far the worst and most fatiguing road that even I was ever over. I only kept myself on the back of my poor labouring horse by the help of his mane, of which I was obliged to keep fast hold.

On reaching the summit of this rocky ridge, we had a view of the extensive plain of Sulimania, green as an emerald, with the city visible at a great distance. On one hand was mount Goodroon; on the other, at a great distance, a range of very high snow-capped mountains. We reached our station at eleven, which was again near one of the artificial mounts so frequent in this part of the country. They evidently mark the progress of some celebrated sovereign of ancient times; perhaps Darius Hystaspes, perhaps Xerxes! I forget the direction of the road from Sardis to Susa, but I suppose it could not run so far up to the north, or one might say these remarkable mounts marked the royal road. There were vestiges of buildings visible on a hill on our left hand.

May 7.—We mounted at six, and directed our course across the plain. We passed over a succession of undulating country, which was divided into rich pastures and cultivation, but very bare of wood; and a fine northerly air rendered the ride most cool and delightful.

At half-past eight, after crossing the bed of a pretty broad torrent, called Tchaktchak, with little water in it, and passing an old deserted village and a burying-ground shaded by four fine spreading oaks, we reached Sertchinar, and were extremely struck with the singularity and beauty of the spot which was to be our resting-place for the day. On the road-side upwards of fifty springs of water burst out of the earth at various distances from each other, and run murmuring over pebbles, here and there impeded by quantities of water-cresses and other aquatic plants, the banks being covered with low brushwood and wild mint. They all meet, and very soon become one considerable stream, which running through the plain, where it waters fields of rice, finds its way to the Diala, and may even be said to be one of the chief streams that form that most useful river. At the head of the sources of the river, on the side of a very picturesque little knoll or hill covered with a soft green down, we remarked two pretty mulberry trees, which are said to mark the site of a battle fought in very ancient times. The Koords pretend that Ali defeated the infidels on this spot, and that the mulberry trees sprang up miraculously when he planted his spear.

On reaching our encampment, I found that though we were only about an hour's journey from the town, we were, at the particular request of the Pasha, to remain here to-day. As the weather was fine, our place of encampment beautiful, and as we did not wish to interfere with any arrangements the Pasha might choose to make, his proposal was agreed to immediately. Two or three of his gentlemen were sent out by him, to be in attendance ; several mules, loaded with provisions and fruit for ourselves and people, were speedily dispatched to our camp, and every mark of attention and hospitality displayed ; altogether giving us a very favourable impression of at least the governor of Koordistan.

May 8.—As it did not yet suit our Carduchian friend's arrangements that we should enter the town to-day, we encamped in a garden belonging to the Pasha, which was almost one with the town. I was consequently obliged to give up riding, and to consent to be closely shut up in my takht-revan, as it was expected great crowds would assemble to stare at perhaps the first Europeans they had ever seen, at least in their own dress; and, above all, the sepoy would attract their attention, both from their love of everything connected with war, and the singularity of seeing soldiers who seemed at once Mahometans, Indians, and Europeans.

After a ride of an hour and a half over an undulating country, we arrived at our camp, which was pitched in a very beautiful situation, and the tent intended for me was just within the garden itself, which had no other defence round it than a row of thickly-planted poplar trees, which were, however, sufficiently apart to leave open the view of the surrounding hills, and the plain on which were scattered our white tents. On the one hand lay the town, on the other mount Goodroon, which from thence looked most picturesque, and immediately about us were poplars, very graceful willows, and other trees, with innumerable rose bushes of great height, and most profusely covered with sweeter smelling flowers than I ever remember to have seen. To complete the beauty of the scene, thousands of birds, and among the rest linnets and nightingales, were heard in every direction. The day was most lovely, and even in the sun the heat was not oppressive.

On alighting from the takht-revan, I was quite surprised to see no strangers whatever about our camp, which looked as quiet as ever our encampment on the banks of the Tigris had done. All the principal gentlemen of the town had been out to welcome Claude. They took their coffee, sat a short time, without either staring or being any otherwise than perfectly well bred, and soon went away.

Strict orders have been issued by the Pasha, under pain of severe punishment, that nobody whatever is to approach our camp, except sent by him, which accounts for our present tranquillity ; as otherwise, they say, and indeed I think very naturally, the whole town, men, women, and children, would have encircled us, from morning until night, to stare at such a perfectly new sight.

Soon after our arrival, a Tartar or courier from Constantinople arrived from Bagdad, whither he had gone, not knowing of our having set out on our journey. The packet of which he was the bearer contained the news of the King's death on the 29th of January, and that of the Duke of Kent on the 24th of the same month. With my usual mixed feelings of delight and dread did I tremblingly open the dispatches, but I was much disappointed in seeing none of the beloved hand-writing. Not a single line even from Mardocks, which made us very unhappy, until in a newspaper of the middle of February I saw my father's name, which re-assured us a little.

In consequence of the news of the King's death, the Tartar must be dispatched immediately, and we must deprive ourselves of the pleasure of reading the newspapers. We however glanced rapidly over the Evening Mails down to the 14th of February, which is rather a late date, considering that the packet had been to Bagdad, and from thence was sent here. The Tartar came in four days from Bagdad, by the Seghirmeh or short road. In a wild and almost unknown country did we read my dear father's admirable speeches on the Libel Act and the Stamp Act, which, if anything could stop the tyrannical career of our present un-English ministers, must have succeeded in carrying these important points. The murder of the Duc de Berri seems to argue a dreadful state of feeling in France, and one more hostile than ever to the unfortunate Bourbon family, which, notwithstanding their crimes, it is impossible not to pity. What virtue can we expect from the continent of Europe, when even England, to whom all nations were accustomed to look up with so much reverence, has so degenerated and fallen.

By this packet we received an abundant supply of reading, Journaux des Savans, Journaux des Dames, Edinburgh and Quarterly Reviews, and they are come at the very right time to refresh us after our long journey. I am afraid Xenophon and his Greeks, during their march through Carduchia, never tasted the luxury of receiving letters from Greece with the Morning Chronicles from Sparta and the last Athens Review!

In the midst of our interesting occupation, which had made us quite forget where we were and all about us, we were recalled to a recollection of our situation by a message from Mahmood Pasha, the present governor of Sulimania, informing Claude that at Ikindi, or after his afternoon prayer, he intended doing himself the pleasure of waiting upon him. Mr. Rich remonstrated, saying that he felt it would be more becoming him to pay his respects first to the Pasha, and that he had hoped to have had that honour to-morrow. It was all in vain; the Pasha returned for answer, that Mr. Rich and his family were his guests, that his coming was an honour to him and his country, and that he, the Pasha, could not possibly do less than come himself and bid his noble guest welcome to Koordistan.

Our preparations for receiving the Pasha were soon made; the people dressed themselves; the troops were paraded and drawn up to receive him. Accordingly, about half-past four we perceived him coming out of the town, himself only on horseback, with upwards of two hundred very well-dressed men walking before and behind, and on each side of his horse. Those immediately about his person had all Cashmere shawls on their heads, and wore dresses of rich Guzerat gold stuffs.

The costume of the Koords is much the same as that of the Turks, with the exception of the shawl on the head, which in general is a gay-coloured silk, not unlike the Mackintosh tartan, with deep fringe hanging negligently down the back.

It is very picturesque, and far from being unbecoming, particularly in a great crowd. The Koords appear to be extremely fond of gaudy colours, such as bright red, crimson, and yellow, which added much to the barbaric beauty of the Pasha's procession. On the sepoys saluting the Pasha, he seemed to understand the honour paid him, and very gracefully returned the salute by laying his hand on his breast. The moment he perceived Mr. Rich coming out of the tent to meet him, he dismounted from his horse (upon which, by the bye, up leapt instantly his Imrahor, or Master of the Horse), and advancing on foot, he shook Mr. Rich by the hand most cordially. As well as I could perceive him at a considerable distance, peeping through the wall of my tent, he appeared a small, short man, without anything striking or distinguished in his appearance. He formed indeed a curious contrast to his attendants, all of whom were large, military-looking men. He is the eldest of five sons of the late celebrated Abdurrahman Pasha, and about thirty-five years of age, of a mild and humane disposition, but wanting firmness and decision, and very religious; consequently he is much under the guidance of the priests and Ulema, not the most enlightened body in any part of the Mahometan empire, and said to be here remarkably fanatic and gloomy. The Pasha is of too tender and gentle a nature to be much under the influence of their fanaticism ; but he is of a very melancholy disposition, and naturally inclined to take a gloomy view of things around him.

He remained some time with Mr. Rich, talking very freely and confidentially of the state of his own affairs, which are at present rather embarrassed both with Persia and Turkey. He said he hoped Mr. Rich might be of service to him ; that it was true he had never had the pleasure of seeing him, but that his fame was great, and that he could not show too much honour to such a guest, with many more compliments in the same style. He has appointed the day after to-morrow morning, at nine o'clock, for Mr. Rich's public entry into the town, evidently a calculated lucky hour, by the importance he attached to our party being very punctual. His second brother, Osman Bey, is to be the mehmandar.

In the evening we took a stroll through the beautiful garden, and the air was quite scented with the smell of roses. I feel very unwilling to leave this delightful spot for the town, which does not look at all inviting, and the houses are all said to be very wretched. I would fain remain where I am ; but if the good-natured, kind Pasha shows any eagerness for our going into the town, I would rather sacrifice my own wishes and oblige him.

May 9.—We rose as usual about five, and wandered for some time about the garden, amidst the opening roses still wet with dew, enjoying the delicious freshness of the morning air. In the afternoon Abdulla Pasha, an uncle of the present Pasha's, and an old friend of Mr. Rich's, paid him a visit, and expressed great delight at seeing him in Koor-distan.

May 10.—We breakfasted early, in order to be in readiness for Osman Bey, the Pasha's brother, and the person appointed by him to escort Mr. Rich into the town. He arrived about eight o'clock, accompanied by all the muhsahibjees, or councillors, who are allowed to sit in the Pasha's presence, with a great crowd of followers on foot. The Bey is a year or two younger than the Pasha, but very different in his appearance, being remarkably handsome, of a very striking figure, and magnificently dressed. He is reported, however, not to be of so amiable a character as his brother; and from his great love of splendour and show, he is said often to have recourse to cruelty and injustice, in order to procure the means of gratifying his inclinations. He is brave and intelligent, anxious for information, and devoted to his country, the interest of which he evidently thinks it is rather to cultivate the friendship of Persia than that of Turkey. His patriotism gets the better even of religious prejudice, which would naturally make a Koord and a Persian bitter enemies, the former being all bigoted Sunnites, and the latter Shiites.

During his visit he was constantly looking at his watch, seemed very anxious, every now and then questioning his people about the time. At last he started up, and begged Mr. Rich to mount immediately, this being evidently the favourable moment calculated for this important event. The Koords, as may be supposed from their state of barbarism, are extremely superstitious: more so, I believe, if possible, even than the Turks.

The procession into town made a very fine show, from its numbers and variety of costumes. It was composed of Europeans, Koords in their gay attire, sepoys with their drums and fifes, Russian hussars with their bugle, the Turkish, Christian, and even Jewish officers and servants of the residency, and altogether presented a medley of barbaric magnificence and European regularity that was very striking, and not an uncharacteristic emblem of Europe and Asia. The party had been gone some time, and I was beginning to watch for their return, when, to my surprise and disappointment, Aga Minas* arrived alone, with a request that I would go into town. I was the less prepared for this, as last night, from the very bad report that had been given us of the Carduchian habitations, we had determined upon remaining in tents in the garden, in spite of the violent squalls of wind, which we were told would in a moment lay our tents flat.

However, it appears the Pasha expressed so great a desire that we should reside in the town, and seemed to think that Mr. Rich's going back to his camp would be so unlucky an omen, that he at last yielded, thinking it better to put up with an inconvenience than to hurt the feelings and prejudices of those who are so kind and hospitable. We accordingly packed up, and I once more got into my takht-revan, the scarlet cloth over which was closely fastened all round it, that no one might have even a glimpse of me; besides which, I was closely enveloped in my tcharshaf† and veil. But on an occasion like the present, when the haram of a great man was to pass publicly as it were through a crowd, not even the corner of her veil must be seen, so that I arrived at our place of abode, for house I can scarcely call it, without seeing anything of Sulimania or its inhabitants; the low continued sound of voices around me, as I passed through thus closely shut up, being the only evidence I had of my having entered a town.

But all my curiosity about the capital, the country, and its inhabitants, was converted into disgust at them all, on beholding the place destined for my residence. It required considerable courage to venture in through the mass of ruins it presented from the outer court ; however, at last I made a desperate effort, and rushed in, followed by Mr. Bellino and the little Italian doctor, the former very judiciously endeavouring to puff the dust off, the other holding up his hands and shrugging up his shoulders most theatrically. But I must try if possible to describe it.

* The chief dragoman, or interpreter, of the residency.

† A large sheet made of black and blue checked silk, round which is a border of gold; it completely envelopes the whole person, except the face, over which is worn a black horsehair veil, that very effectually hides the wearer, who, however, can see clearly through it.

I first passed through the court of the Divan Khaneh, to come to the gate of the haram ; on first entering the court of which I was agreeably surprised and struck with the beauty of my retreat, as before me was a very pretty assemblage of trees, shrubs, and grass (remember I am an inhabitant of a parched, burnt-up desert land), round which, in wild confusion, were rose-bushes of great height and variety of form, and quite dyed with the quantity of flowers in all stages ; and here and there creeping in amongst them, and climbing the neighbouring tree, a fine vine was visible with its vivid green, and just beginning to flower. Graceful poplars, willows, and pomegranate trees completed the beauty of the scene, and made me forget to turn to the right, where stood the rustic dwelling of this little paradise ; on entering which, alas ! the whole enchantment vanished ! I was reminded of the time I travelled in Italy with my dear father. As long as we were on the road, we were delighted with everything we saw ; but the moment we entered an inn the scene was sadly changed. Thus it was with me now, on beholding this my destined place of abode for at least one month.

The building is composed of bricks baked in the sun, with a facing inside of mud and chopped straw. The roof, which is of mud, and flat, is supported on bamboos by large beams, laid crossways, that have no other painting or colouring than that produced by the smoke of the winter fires ; which, to judge by the colour of the ceilings of all the rooms, must be pretty considerable ; and perhaps the smoke is encouraged by the Koords on the same principle as old Eleanor's, the Irish peasant in Ennui, because it kept her warm ! The building is raised on a platform about three feet from the ground, upon which are disposed all the different apartments, there being no upper story. The entry is by a portico, in which the natives sleep during summer. On the right is a small room, and in front a long, dark dismal-looking gallery, with mud floor and walls, and in which was a very damp unwholesome smell. Here the delicate Koords pass the heat of the summer days, as being a cool retreat, though I should prefer being subjected to the burning heat of our Bagdad deserts.

On the left is a passage, with another door, into the court—a large room, with three windows looking into the garden, and the same number towards the gallery. It had once been whitewashed, but was now in such a state that a plain mud wall would have been infinitely preferable.

The passage is terminated by another similar room, within which are two smaller ones. Returning from these into the passage, and on the left hand, were one or two doors leading, I believe, into some kind of rooms, but I had not courage to explore them. Much rather would I have entered with Emily into the east turret.

The Haram and Divan Khaneh are one building, which stands on a slightly raised platform, the two divisions of the house being placed as it were back to back. One wall runs round the whole, leaving a very large inclosure ; and on each side of the house, where the haram and divan khaneh join, are two walls running across the large inclosure, and dividing it into two courts. A gate in one of these walls is the only mode of communication between the two parts of the building.

With the divan khaneh I have nothing to do—never even being likely to see it. The disposition is very similar to that of the haram, and the condition of it, if possible, even worse. I pity Mr. Bellino and our people, who are to inhabit it.

We pitched upon the largest room, with plenty of windows, as the best sleeping place, intending to make the portico, or talar, our dining-room; but alas! the heat, smell, and little active animals soon obliged us at night to have our beds removed out into the dining-room: and even here we did not fare much better.

May 20.—There has been a long interval in my journal; but I have led so retired a life since we entered Sulimania, that I have had few things worth recording: besides which, I have had much writing, in the way of letters. I have only passed the gate of the haram once since I entered it, to go to the bath, which, in so miserable a town, I was surprised to find really very handsome. The entrance was not very promising: it was by so low a door that I was obliged to stoop to pass through it. The reason of making the door so very low is to secure the bath from being suddenly entered in times of confusion and war.

As soon as we had passed the door, we found ourselves in a very large vaulted room, well lighted from above, and a broad kind of platform, elevated three or four feet above the ground, running all round this spacious room, and spread with carpets, for the accommodation of dressing and undressing.

In the middle of the apartment was a large circular marble basin, full of clear water, bubbling up most agreeably through a small stone pipe. Beyond this public room was a more private one leading into the bath itself, which was clean, well heated, and abundantly supplied with clear hot and cold water.

June 6.—To-day I engaged to spend with the Pasha's haram, and, as in the east they expect their visiters literally to spend the day, I was ready by ten o'clock, when a woman from the palace came to show us the way to the haram. I was accompanied by Aga Minas's mother and my female servants, and closely veiled we sallied forth. We had not far to walk, as our house was very near the palace. The entrance to the haram was not through the outer court of the palace, but at the back of the haram itself, through so small a door that I was obliged to bend double to pass through.

The keywannis, or duennas, followed by a crowd of slave girls, met me here, and one taking me under each arm led me upstairs. At the door of a large room I was received by the Pasha's wife herself, followed by a sister of the Pasha's, and a great number of the ladies of the family. Coffee, sweetmeats, sherbet, and caleoons were served as usual, and I was overpowered with a profusion of compliments, which continued for some time on their part and mine, but as soon as this necessary piece of etiquette was over, they laid aside all ceremony, though perfectly well-bred, easy, and unaffected, and seemed only anxious to make me comfortable.

The Pasha's wife, Adela Khanum, is the daughter of Osman Pasha, and consequently nearly related to her husband; indeed, all the members of this very numerous family are thus doubly related, they never intermarrying with strangers. Adela Khanum is about twenty-seven or twenty-eight years of age, rather taller than the rest of the family; she is a brunette, with fine soft black eyes, a clear and fine complexion, and a very mild and touching expression of countenance. She looked as if she had known sorrow, there was a dignified resignation and a stillness in her deportment that quite affected me. She is the only wife of the Pasha, and they are much attached to each other, and have been endeared to one another by their common sorrow for the death of many children by the small-pox. They have one little boy* only now living, and though tenderly attached to him, she seemed almost afraid to speak of him as likely to remain with them. Her eyes filled with tears as she most tenderly looked at him, and added, "he is not mine, but God's. His will be done." I spoke to her of having him vaccinated. She listened most attentively to what I told her of its virtues, and yet seemed fearful of indulging too sanguine expectations from it. She encouraged me to hope she would use, if I could procure, the vaccine matter; but concluded with saying, "God's will be done. He knows best—we must trust God." I purpose writing to Bagdad immediately for the matter to be sent up by an express courier, and I shall be made very happy if I succeed in preserving this precious little one from that cruel and fatal disorder, which destroys thousands in Koordistan. Perhaps too when they hear their Pasha has consented to try the vaccine on his only child, the common people may be induced to allow us to vaccinate their children. Our journey to Koordistan will then indeed not have been in vain, if we succeed in diminishing the violence of that scourge the small-pox, even if we should not be permitted to succeed in extinguishing the disease altogether.

My interesting hostess had passed many years in Bagdad during her childhood, and had then learnt Turkish, but from long want of practice, she now speaks it with difficulty;

* In this I was mistaken. There were two sons. The eldest was then a hostage at Kernanshah, but he probably had had the small-pox, and his mother no longer felt the same anxiety about him as she did for the little one, over whose head it was still threatening, and of whom therefore she alone spoke.

however she exerted herself to the utmost to converse with me, and I really spent a very agreeable day with her and her numerous company, and returned home about five in the afternoon, much less tired than I had expected.

II.

Information, collected from Natives, concerning Jezira and the adjacent Country. (Referred to at p. 105.)

There are two descriptions of Koords under the government of Jezira. The Bohtans, or Boattans, and the Ashitees. These latter are principally situated in the plains towards Nisibis and Tchillaga, and have of late, from the laxness of the government, become very powerful and unruly.

Tchemishkezek—A Koordish principality, twelve hours from Argana, near the lake in Mount Taurus, called Ghiolbashi.

Tchernek—Another Koordish principality, eight hours from Argana, under Mount Taurus.

The Bayazid family are of the Sibki tribe.

Finik is a castle four hours above Jezira, on the east bank of the Tigris*.

Is—Four hours east of the Tigris and Finik.

Beshiro—belongs to Diarbekir, six hours on the Rodwan road, where are the Barrazee Koords.

Zerki is between Bitlis, Sert, and Moosh. A district, the capital of which is Derzeni, four hours from Sert.

The Rozheki is a great tribe about Betlis.

One stage from Sillugh is a great Christian place of pilgrimage called Tchengedeh, or Tchengelli. Here is the convent of Surp Karabied, or St. John the Baptist. It is six hours from Moosh, near the Meagha Kiat, a river which falls into the Euphrates. This convent is the most celebrated place of pilgrimage among the Armenians after Etchmiazin. They first go to Kaiseria, where is a famous convent supposed to possess the head of St. John, and thence they come to Tchengedeh, after which they proceed on to Etchmiazin. There are several convents about Tchengedeh. Of the principal one they tell many superstitious stories. The saint there is celebrated for teaching arts and trades—all except music—and he will allow of no women to come near him for the sake of Herodias. There is a deep well there, from which sounds are heard, proceeding, as the Armenians pretend, from imprisoned demons, and poor (light or glory) is said frequently to be seen about that spot, especially after a little rain. This may therefore be a very natural appearance.

* Ammianus, lib. xx., pp. 15, 18, 26, mentions Bezabde and Phœnica.

Belghean, four hours from Finik, east of the Tigris.

Arzen, now vulgarly called Herzin, a place between Diarbekir and Sert, but near the mountains.

Batman is a ruined bridge over the Sert river, three hours above the town. There are ruins of a town there, now uninhabited. Batman Tchai is the Sert river, or true Tigris.

There is said to be the remains of a bridge over the Tigris at Jezira.

Hassan, a mountain forming part of Taurus and Zagros, between Diarbekir, Palo, and Moosh. It is no thoroughfare, and the people are entirely independent. The Koords who inhabit all that part are called Zaza, which seems to be a nickname, and means stuttering, mouthing, or speaking unintelligibly.

From Rodwan to Hazo is eight hours. The family of Hazo is very ancient and much respected.

Kufra, a town, six hours from Sert, on the Bitlis road, in the district of Shirwan. The castle of Shirwan is only an hour from Kufra. The Bey is powerful and independent, and is a younger branch of the Hassan Keif family, and consequently is an Eyubite or descendant of Saladin. There is a gold mine in Shirwan.

Iroon adjoins Se-gueiza and Tchukoor, three hours from Kufra. Chestnuts are brought to Bagdad from these places.

From Sert to Shirwan is six hours; to Maden six; to Heizan six.

Kerni is two hours from Heizan, and four or five hours from Shirwan. It is a very wild and mountainous district.

Among the Koords hereabouts are the Ambarlu and Tchigeni tribes, one chief of whom pretends to be of Sassanian origin.

Koor Keat is a river which you pass eight hours from Toprak Kalaa, on the road from Toprak Kalaa to Bayazid. It comes from the Kaghzman mountains near Kars, and falls into the Euphrates. It is frequently swollen to a great size, but even when there is but little water in it, the passage is dangerous, as it is full of large holes, and the current is extremely rapid. On this account guides are always necessary.

The Avi Masi, or fish river, said to be as big as the Zab, runs between Shoshik and Khamoor. It rises near Arjish on the lake Van, and falls into the Euphrates near Malazkerd. It abounds with fine trout.

Khamoor is a place which gives name to a district of Bayazid, and is half way between Bayazid and Moosh. Shooshik is eight hours from Khamoor.

No rivers enter the lake Van, which seems the highest part of the plateau of Armenia.

There are great ruins at Akhlát, which is now almost deserted. The same at Aljawaz, part of which has been carried away by the lake, on the shores of which are still the remains of a town as large as Bagdad. Binghieul is a lake, with a rock in the centre, totally inaccessible. The Arras or Araxes issues from it.

Four hours from Bayazid runs a subterranean river, which discharges itself into the Araxes. It is visible at no part of its course, but the noise of rushing waters is every where audible, and the whirlpool and discoloured state of the waters at the place of its junction is quite marked. Fruitless attempts have been made to dig into its bed, which appears to be at a great depth.

On the rock on which the castle of Bayazid is built are sculptures representing three men with staves in their hands and books under their arms.

The castle of Miks, where the eastern Tigris rises, is 11 hours beyond Julamerk. It bursts at once from a cavern in the mountain, and is in its earliest course a much more considerable river than the Diarbekir branch. It passes by Sert, where it is a difficult ford even at its lowest. It is joined by the Diarbekir river at Tela Navrua, between Diarbekir and Jezira. The road to Miks from Sert is as follows :—

Sert to	Hours.
Kormas, a castle belonging to the Shirwan
Bey	4
Dergen	4
Berwaree	6
This is a tribe belonging to Jezira. It is large and respectable. All the wax and honey of these parts come from among this tribe.
Miks	6
	—
	20
	—

Miks now belongs to Hakkari, and is governed by a relation of Mustafa Khan's of Julamerk.

From Sert to Diarbekir is 34 hours, by the following places :—

Tela Navrua	5
Rodwan*	5
Rajir Kharab	4
Sinagari	6
A wandering Koordish tribe.
Belaidun	8
Diarbekir	6
						<hr/> 34

The Diarbekir branch of the Tigris passes by Rodwan and Hassan Keif, before it joins the proper Tigris. The Mahalleemi Koords live in caverns hereabouts, cut in the cliffs of the Tigris. There is a prodigious number of these caves, which are said to be very ancient, and cut into different apartments.

The Khabour, which passes through Zakho, rises in the mountains of Amadia, on this side of the town of Amadia, and has four sources. Macdonald Kinneir unaccountably confounds it with the Sert river. The Pishabour is the name of the united streams of the Heizel and Khabour. The Heizel is one hour farther on between Zakho and Solopia. They unite below Zakho. They also receive the Shakh river†.

Route from Mousul to Jezira :—

Telescof	6
Nemir	6

A Yezid village, where a Yezid chief resides. —

Carried over . 12

* Rodwan is four hours from Hassan Keif, on the north bank of the Tigris or Diarbekir river. Rodwan is on the Diarbekir, and Hassan Keif on the Mardin side of the river.

† There is another river of this name near Miks, in the territory of Hakkari.

	Brought over	Hours.
Then ford the Heizel.	.	12
Telkeshan	6
Zakho	3
Solopia	5
In the district in which is Mount Judi.
Jezira	5
		<hr/>
		31
From Jezira to Sert.		<hr/>
Finik	4
A very ancient and celebrated castle, mentioned in the Tarikh Al Akrad.
Tchevlik	8
Tela Navrua	3
Junction of the two branches of the Tigris.
Sert	5
		<hr/>
		20
Sert to Bitlis.		<hr/>
Se-guiez, or the three Walnut Trees .	.	6
Bitlis	6
		<hr/>
		12
From Bitlis to Erzerroom.		<hr/>
Tchakur	6
Khas Keuy	8
Tchevirmeh	3
Sullugh	5
A wooden bridge over the Euphrates.
Tchargor	5
Aroosseh	7
To the Aras	8
Delli Baba	5
Kizzeljah	4
Over a mountain to
Erzerroom	5
		<hr/>
		56

III.

A Series of the Princes of the Bebbeh Family from Suliman Baba or Bebbeh, down to the present Pasha of Sulimania.—
(Referred to at p. 302, Vol. i.)

	A. H.	Time reigned. Yrs. Months.
1 Suliman Bey Ghazi (i. e. Baba Suliman), son of Mir Suliman, began to reign	. 1088	4
2 Temir Khan Beg 1110	4
3 Bekir Beg 1115	13
There was now an interregnum, during which Koordistan was governed by Turkish Mussellims
	. 1128	4
4 After four years, Khana Pasha reigned three years in Koordistan, and seven years in Sinna, which he conquered, and built a mosque there, which was pulled down a year or two ago by Aman ullah Khan	. 1132	3
5 Nawaub Khaled Pasha, son of Bekir Beg.	1135	4
6 Ferhad Pasha 1139	2
7 Khaled Pasha again 1141	15
8 Nuwaub Selim Pasha 1156	4
9 Nuwaub Suliman Pasha 1160	3
10 Selim Pasha again 1163	14
11 Suliman Pasha again, by whose machina- tions Selim had been strangled at Bagdad. Suliman built the mosque and bath at Zengabad. In his time Zengabad Men- dilli, and Bedira Jessan, formed part of Koordistan 1164	10
The Great Plague happened in his time		1171
12 Mahommed Pasha, son of Khana Pasha. He was killed in battle by Suliman Pasha 1174	5
13 Suliman Pasha again 1175	1

		A. H.	Time reigned.
			Yrs.	Months.
14	Ahmed Pasha, son of Khaled Pasha	. 1176	1
15	Suliman Pasha again 1177	2
16	Ahmed Pasha again 1177	5
17	Suliman Pasha again. Assassinated by Fakih Ibrahim 1177	1
18	Mahommed Pasha, son of Khaled Pasha, and father of Khaled Bey 1178	8
19	Ahmed Pasha again 1186	1	3
	N. B.—He was the father of Ibrahim Pasha and the present Khaled Pasha, and elder brother of Mahommed Pasha.
20	Mahommed Pasha took Ahmed Pasha pri- soner* at Ahmed Kulwan, and reigned again. A slight plague in his time 1187	2
21	Ahmed Pasha again defeated Mahommed Pasha, who was assisted by Ali Murad Khan, at Surseer and Tchuarta. Ali Murad Khan was taken prisoner 1189	1	3
22	Mahommed Pasha came again from Persia, assisted by Shefi Khan, the Zend general, and was again driven out 1190	9
23	He came again with Mahommed Ali Serdar. Battle between Mahommed Pasha and Khosru, Khan of Sinna, near Zeribar, in which the latter was totally defeated 1191	1
24	Kelb Ali Khan, a Zend general, came to the assistance of Ahmed Pasha, and re-seated him on the throne. Mahommed Pasha fled to Keuy Sanjiak 1191

* Ahmed Pasha, after having been taken prisoner by his brother Mahommed Pasha, made his escape, and returned with the aid of Turkish forces, and reigned six months. Mahommed Pasha, in his turn, fled to Persia, and returned with Ali Murad Khan. They were defeated at Surseer.

A. H. Time reigned.
Yrs. Months.

- 25 Mahommed Pasha returned with Temir, Pasha of Keuy Sanjiak. They fought with Ahmed Pasha below Gilleh Zerdeh. The battle was desperate. They were more than an hour hand to hand with sabres and daggers, and the slaughter was very great. Temir Pasha was killed, and Mahommed Pasha taken prisoner. His eyes were put out immediately by his brother Ahmed Pasha, who himself died a natural death seventeen days afterwards, in the Karadagh, on his return to Karatcholan 1192
- 26 Nuwaub Mahommed Pasha, father of Abdurrahman Pasha. He was killed in battle at Yeltimar, between Sakiz and Saouk Boulak, by Boodakh Khan, the Prince of Saouk Boulak, against whom he was fighting 1193 5
- 27 Nuwaub Ibrahim Pasha, the founder of Sulimania 1198 3
- He seized Hassan Khan Bey and Hussein Bey, two princes of his own family, and sent them prisoners to Bagdad, where they were first banished to Hilla, and then strangled . 1200
- 28 Osman Pasha, the elder brother of Abdurrahman Pasha 1201 2
- 29 Ibrahim Pasha again 1203 1
- 30 Nuwaub Abdurrahman Pasha 1204 8
- 31 Ibrahim Pasha again 1212 5

What is called the Little Plague happened.

		A. H.	Time reigned.
		Yrs.	Months.
32	Abdurrahman Pasha again . . .	1217	2
	Ibrahim Pasha died at Mousul during Ali Pasha's, of Bagdad, expedition to Sinjar. Ali Pasha had deposed him. His death happened . . .	1217
	Abdurrahman Pasha revolted from Ali Pasha, stabbed Mahommed Pasha of Keuy Sanjiak with his 'own hand, on his retreat from Bagdad, and imme- diately after defeated Khaled Pasha at Altoon Kiupri. The Pasha of Bagdad came in person, and established Khaled Pasha at Sulimania. Abdurrahman Pasha fled to Persia . . .	1218
33	Khaled Pasha	1219	1
34	Adurrahman Pasha returned from Persia, defeated the auxiliary Turks and Koords at Zeribar, and took Suliman Kiahya of Bagdad prisoner	1221
35	Abdurrahman Pasha was again forced to fly from Sulimania; and the Turks under Suliman Kiahya, now become Pasha of Bagdad, placed on the throne Suliman Pasha, son of Ibrahim Pasha * . . .	1223	3
36	Abdurrahman Pasha again made himself master of Koordistan. The Shahzadeh of Kermanshah leagued against him with the Turks, and forced him to retreat to Keuy Sanjiak, which was besieged by the Persians, who raised the siege after it had lasted one month and four days.

* This was the year (1805) in which I came to Bagdad.

A. II. Time reigned.

This was in 1224. Abdurrahman Pasha returned to Sulimania	.	.	1226
Death of Abdurrahman Pasha	.	.	1228
37 Nuwaub Mahmood Pasha, the eldest son of Abdurrahman Pasha, succeeded his father, and is the present prince	.	.	1228

Dates and Facts connected with the History of Koordistan.

(Referred to in p. 302, Vol. I.)

Suliman Bey, that is, Baba Suliman, defeated by the united forces of Turkey and Persia, and forced to fly from Koordistan. He then went to Constantinople	.	.	.	1110

Bekir Beg defeated	.	.	.	1120
The siege of Bagdad	.	.	.	1130
Hamadan taken by the Turks	.	.	.	1135
Khana Pasha of Koordistan killed	.	.	.	1145
Topal Osman Pasha's battle	.	.	.	1144
Siege of Mousul	.	.	.	1154
Khaled, Pasha of Koordistan, fled to Orfa				1155
He died there	.	.	.	1156
Yeghan Pasha, the Turkish General, defeated	.	.	.	1156
Nadir Shah killed	.	.	.	1158
Death of Adel Shah	.	.	.	1161
Death of Ibrahim Shah	.	.	.	1162
Suliman, Pasha of Bagdad, began to reign				1164
Osman, Pasha of Keuy Sanjiak, put to death by Suliman, Pasha of Bagdad	.	.	.	1164

	A. H. Time reigned.
Selim, Pasha of Karatcholan, put to death at Bagdad	1171
The great plague	1171
Mahommed Pasha, the Bebbeh, defeated on the Nareen by the Pasha of Bagdad	1176
Suliman Pasha assassinated	1178
Second Plague	1187
Suliman, Pasha of Bagdad, killed	1171
Ahmed Pasha taken prisoner at Ahmed Kulwan	1187
Ali Mourad Khan taken prisoner by Ahmed Pasha	1188
Shefi Khan came to the assistance of Ma- hommed Pasha	1188
Kelb Ali Khan came—Defeat of Khosroo Khan by Mahommed Pasha	1191
Great earthquake at Tabreez	1194
Mahommed and Ahmed Pashas went to Kerkook	1191
Mahommed Pasha defeated by Ahmed Pasha	1191
Death of Ahmed Pasha	1192
Death of Kerim Khan, King of Persia	1192
Death of Abdulla Pasha of Zehav	1193
Mahmood Pasha, the grandfather of the present Pasha, began to reign	1192
Reza Kouli Khan killed	1197
Mahommed Pasha, who had been banished, fled to Persia. He returned afterwards, and was, with Omar Pasha, another chief, put to death by Mahmood Pasha under the great tree at Karatcholan	1194
Ibrahim Pasha began his reign	1197

	A. H.	Time reigned.
Second building of Sulimania . . .	1199
Mahmood Pasha killed . . .	1198
Osman Pasha began to reign . . .	1201
Death of Osman Pasha . . .	1203
Earthquake at Sulimania . . .	1217
Suliman, Pasha of Bagdad, died, and was succeeded by Ali Pasha . . .	1217
Ibrahim Pasha died . . .	1218
Feth Ali Shah, the present King of Per- sia, began to reign . . .	1211
Abdurrahman Pasha revolted from Ali Pasha — killed Mahmood Pasha of Keuy Sanjiak, and defeated Khaled Pasha at Altoon Kiupri—Ali Pasha im- mediately marched from Bagdad, and de- feated Abdurrahman Pasha at Derbent	1220
Khaled Pasha came to Sulimania and reigned . . .		1 year
Second affair of Derbent under little Suli- man Pasha of Bagdad *	1223
Battle of Kifri . . .	1226
Suliman, Pasha of Bagdad, killed . . .	1225
Abdurrahman Pasha finally returned to Sulimania . . .	1226

* This year, 1808, I came to Bagdad.

IV.

ROUTES PROCURED AT DIFFERENT PLACES.

AT AHMED KULWAN.

From Ahmed Kulwan, in the district of Kizzeljee, to Zehav.

	Hours.	Observations.
Surajoo, in Shehrizoor, called in Koordish, Sharazoor	6½	Hilly — no high mountains to cross.
Banikhilan	6½	The first part of the road in the plain of Shehrizoor. Onapproaching Banikhilan, you cross a mountain, and arrive at Banikhilan, where the Diala receives several streams from Koordistan.
Zehav	10	The plain of Bajilan.
	<hr/> 23 <hr/>

Ahmed Kulwan to Kermanshah, by the Shamian road.

N.B. This road is the shortest and most level of all those which lead from Koordistan to Kermanshah. It runs almost the whole way through a defile between two mountains.

	Hours.	Observations.
Saonlaowa	6	In the territory of Sinna, a valley all the way.
Palingan	5	Continuation of the valley.
Kermanshah	10	Level.
	<hr/> 21 <hr/>

This road is described by the Koords as being the most convenient for the passage of tribes, with their families, baggage, flocks, &c.

ROUTES COLLECTED AT SINNA.

SINNA TO HAMADAN.						Farsakhs.
Dehkelan	6
Korweh	6
Hamakesi	6
Hamadan	6
						—
						24
TO KERMANSHAH.						—
Koruk	5
Kamyareh	5
Kermanshah	7
						—
						17
TO TABREEZ.						—
Baklabad	6
Kilekebood	6
Sakiz	9
Gul Tepch	6
Meiandoav	8
Lukler	9
Ak Tepch	11
Tabreez	12
						—
						67
TO MARAGHA.						—
Haladereh	5
Diwanvereh	5
Kaplan To	5
Sefakhaneh	4
Saen Kalaa	7
Deczeh	6
Maragha	4
						—
						36
						—

ROUTE FROM SINNA TO HAMADAN, CORRECTED FROM MR. BELINO'S
JOURNAL.

	Called.	Really.
Dekkilan . .	7 farsakhs	9 hours 55 minutes
Koorba . .	5 —	7 — 15 —
Hamakesi . .	5 —	6 — 20 —
Hamadan . .	5 —	7 — 30 —
	<hr/> 22 farsakhs	<hr/> 31 hours 0 minutes.
	<hr/>	<hr/>

V.

Particulars relating to the Topography of Koordistan ; collected from the best authorities at Sulimania, and carefully compared with the accounts of various Persons.

From Ahmed Kulwan to Nilpareez, through a pass in the Tariler, 3 hours.

Tchiftan, over hills, 2 hours.

Khulambar, the capital of Shehrizoor, 8 hours ; level road.

Khulambar is at the foot of the Avroman mountains.

Khulambar to Khuajall, 2 hours. In a valley in the Avroman mountains.

From Khulambar in a westerly direction, to Hallebjee, 2 hours; under the mountains also ; separated from Juanroo by the Diala, there called the Sirwan water ; and from Banikhilan, the pass of the Diala, by the mountain or line which forms the W. boundary of the plain of Sulimania.

The Diala separates Avroman from Shahoo. The Avroman mountains are nevertheless esteemed a part of the true Shahoo.

ITINERARIES OF SHEHRIZOOR.

Sulimania to

Arbet . . .	4 hours.	Great ruins here. The ruin
Girezeh . . .	4 —	called Kiz Kalaasi is be-
Hassar . . .	2 —	tween Girezeh and Arbet.
Khulambar . . .	2 —	Destanzoor and Yareen
		Tepeh are near it.

12 hours from Sulimania to Khulambar, the capital of Shehrizoor.

Khulambar is close by the Mount Azmir or Giozeh.

The Khulambar river joins the Tanjeroo, and both together fall into the Diala.

Sulimania to Banikhilan.

Sulimania to Derbent Fakhera . . .	5 hours, crossing the Tanjeroo.
Gura Kalau, where there are ruins . . .	4 —
Banikhilan	3 —

12 hours.

Hallebjee to Banikhilan, five hours, through a valley or pass, called Derbent i Khan.

Hallebjee to Derbent i Fakhera, six or seven hours.

From Banikhilan two roads branch off: one to Zehav; another to Zengabad, through Dizziaresh, Khani Tchapel, Zengabad, along the banks of the Diala.

Banikhilan to Zehav.

Herskel	1 hour.
Hoorun	2 —
Serkalaa	4 —
Zehav	3 —
	<hr/> 10 hours. <hr/>

Zehav to Kermanshah.

Zehav to Pishebu	.	.	.	3 hours.
Sooradzæ	.	.	.	3 —
Kerrind	.	.	.	3 —
Thence to Kermanshah.

From Sulimania to Kermanshah, by Hallebjee.

		Hours.
Hallebjee to Khana			Hallebjee is near a mountain
Shoor	.	7 or 8	which is a branch of Shahoo,
Deshteh-oor	.	3 or 4	and is separated from Juan-
Deshteh-leil	.	3	roo by the Diala, which runs
Deshteh-Mordeh	.	2	between the Hallebjee hills
Zimkan	.	3	and Juanroo. There is a passage over the Diala to Juanroo, by a rope extended from cliff to cliff.

Thence, through a pass or valley, to the plain of Mahidesht. From Zimkan to Kermanshah, fourteen hours.

This road is called the middle road. Zehav is the lower road; and the upper road is as follows, through Avroman and Juanroo:—

Khuajæe to Tevileh	.	.	2 hours.
Nowsood	.	.	1½ —
Disheh	.	.	6 —
Pawah	.	.	2½ —
Kalai Juanroo	.	.	8 or 9
Then by Mahidesht to Kermanshah	.	.	12 —

There is yet another road to Kermanshah. It turns off from the lower road, two hours and a half this side of Zehav, to Deshteh Mordeh, through Bizmirava.

Bizmirava is the yalak, or summer quarters of Zehav.

Bizmirava is in Shahoo; after it comes Rezhau, then the Tauk. All are in Shahoo or Zagros.

Shahoo is that part of Zagros that divides the Pashalik of Karatcholan, in Turkish Koordistan, from Persian Koordistan.

There is another road still to Kermanshah, through Kizzeljee to Saoulawa, called the Shamian road, mentioned in No. 2 of the roads procured at Kizzeljee.

The Karadagh, after passing Derbent, goes on to form the Khalkhalan mountains at Keny Sanjiak.

The passes of Zagros between Bebbeh Koordistan and Persia :—

1. Garran; the road to Sinna. This is the southernmost of the passes in this list.

2. Soorkeoul. The road to Soorkeoul branches off the Garran road, at the bridge of Asrabad.

3. Kelliba.

4. Naoukhuan.

5. Peachan. From Beestan to Banna.

6. Kelli Balin. From Banna to Bayandereh.

7. Kelli Khan.

Thence the Zagros winds on E. of Serdesht, and W. of Saook Boulak, and then to Sikeneh.

VI.

SPECIMENS OF THE KOORDISH LANGUAGE,

IN VARIOUS DIALECTS.

	Koordistan Proper.	Bulbassi.	Loristan.	Feileh.
Father	Bab	Bab, Peder	Baouk
Father-in-Law	Khazoo	. . .	Khasseer
Mother	Dayik, Daya	Dak	Dalik	Dayeh
Paternal Uncle	Maam	Mummoo	Ammoo
Maternal ditto	Khal	Khaloo	Tata
Son	Kur	Kur	Rula
Daughter, Girl	Kitch	Kitch	Dyet, or date
Brother	Bera
Sister	Khoshk	Khushk	Khoeeshk	Khowar
Husband	. . .	Merd	Shu
Woman, Wife	Zhin	Zhin	Zoona
Boy	Kur	Kur	Rula
Paternal Aunt	Poor	Mimek	Ketchi
Maternal ditto	Poor	Hala
Child	Mindal	Mina
Man	Piaou
People	Khalk
Head	Ser
Face	Tchurutchav
That is to say, face and eyes, an idiom.
Face	Tchur
Eyes	Tchao	Tchav	Tcheo
Nose	Kuppoo
Ear	Ghiu	Gheh
Forehead	. . .	Natchawa
Hair	Mi	Jakatani
Mouth	Zar
Teeth	Didan
Tongue	Zuwan	Ziman
Beard	Rudain
Whiskers	. . .	Simeir

	Koordistan Proper.	Bulbassi.	Loristan.	Feileh.
Breast	Seng	Sineg
Neck	. . .	Gerdan, Ugtoo
Shoulders	Shan	Shan
Back	. . .	Pisht
Arm	Bask
Hand	Des	Dest	Des
Fingers	. . .	Angoost
Nails	. . .	Nanyok
Foot, Leg	Peo	Peh	Pa
Knees	Hazhnoo	Ezhnoo
Thighs	. . .	Ran
Skin	Piest	Peest
Flesh	. . .	Ghosht
Bone	Jesk, Esk	Estik	Sokang
Blood	Khiun	Khoon
Heart	. . .	Serdul
Navel	Nauk	Naouk	Naock
Belly	Zek	Zug
Milk	. . .	Sheer
Sleep	Khow	Nooslia
To sleep	Nusten
To awake, or to rouse	} . . .	Halista
Pain	Esh	Derd	Zhan
Death	Murdoo	Mird
Life	Zeendoo
Spirit	Noos
Cold	{ Feanik, Zok- kom }	Sermaya
Heat	. . .	Germaya
Sun	Hetaoo	Hatava	Khor
Moon	Mang	Mahang, Maang
Star	Asterra	Asteira	Asara
Rain	Barish	Baran	Waran
Lightning	. . .	{ Burusuk, Burska }
Air	. . .	Ba
Snow	Befer	Bufir	Yekh
Ice	Soher	Bestelek
Day	Roozh	Ruzh
Night	Shev	Show

	Koordistan Proper.	Bulbassi.	Loristan.	Feileh.
Morning	Sebeini
Evening	Khorrava	Ewareh
Summer		Hawin
Spring		Buhar
Autumn		Paiz
Winter		Zistan
Year		Sal
Earth	Hhard	Khol
Water (From the Arabia) .		Aw
River		Rubar
A Fountain	Kani		Kehni
Sand		Rummil
Clay		Kor
Wood	Dar		Tcheleg	Heimeh
Mountain	Kew	Tchia	Kiu
Ascent, height, or cape of a mountain }	Shakh		Kowr	Keuwr
Fire	Aghir	Aghir	Aghir	Tesh
Stone	Berd	Bird	Kutchuk
Gold	Altun	Zer	Tela
Silver	Zioo	Ziuv	Nokreh
Copper		Pakur
Iron		Asin
Salt	Khu	Khueh	Ninek
Grass		Ghiyah
Tree		Dar
Word		Kussa
Strength		Kawat
Storm	Tufan	Furtuna
Wind, or air	Baia	Wa
A great wind		Baiakigawra
Hail	Terz		Teghir
Sea		Bahra
Mount		Ghird
Valley	Nesheoo	Dereh	Khir
Plain, or Desert	Deshit	Tchola	Sahhra
Forest	Beshch	Orman	Zor
A Hare	Kervesh	Kerishk	Kergheh
A Hog		Beraz
A Fox		Riwi

	Koordistan Proper.	Bulbassi.	Loristan.	Feileli.
A Weasel	. .	Dullek
Eggs	Heleka	. . .	Khaia, or Kha	Khaia
A Fowl	Mershk	. . .	Mamir
Mare	Ma-in	. . .	Mohan
Colt	Juwanoo	. . .	Kurreh
Cock	Kelleybab	. . .	Kelleyshir
Hornet, or Bee	Heng	. . .	Seiramuz
Sheep	Mer	. . .	Pes
Lamb	Barkh	. . .	Kaour
Goat	Bizin, Siawun	. . .	Biz
Camel	Wushter	. . .	Ushter
Flea	Ketch	. . .	Keik
Francolin	Por	. . .	Durraj
Pigeon	Kotir	. . .	Kemootir
Hawk	Sakkar	. . .	Tcherkh
Bear	Woortch	. . .	Khers
Lion	Sheir
Antelope	Ask	. . .	Asi
Fish	Masi	. . .	Musi
Partridge	Keow
Black	Resh	. . .	Sieh
White	Spi	. . .	Thermuk
Red	Soor	. . .	Suer
Yellow	Zerd
Blue	Kew	. . .	Shin
Green	Sowz, Tchinai
I am come	Hatem
I will come	Demoua	. . .	Tiam
Go	Burroo	. . .	Betchoo
Come	Wurra	. . .	Boo	Buja
Speak, or say	Bilea	. . .	Beesh
I will speak	Deleam	. . .	Ishim
I will bring	Deanim	. . .	Tigarim
Now	{ Henooka, } { Howeistan }	. . .	Irenga
Take	Biba	. . .	Boua
Why	Botchi	. . .	Erratcha
When	Keughi	. . .	Kei
Welcome	Bekheirhatch	. . .	Khoslhatch
I will go	Derrom	. . .	Detchim

	Koordistan Proper.	Bulbassi.	Loristan.	Feileh.
I won't go	Narrom	. . .	Neitchim
Lentils	Neeshk	. . .	Addes
A vest	Kowa	. . .	Kava
Garden	Rez	. . .	Bakh
Grapes	Terea	. . .	Engheer
Water Melon	Shooti	. . .	Shami
Melon	Kalak	. . .	Khablizeh
Shoes	Sole	. . .	Tchemeesh
Sword	Shir	. . .	Sheer
Shield	Metal	. . .	Khalkhan
Spear	Rum	. . .	Nei
Bow	Kawan	. . .	Kawan
Arrow	Tcer
Cotton	Loka	. . .	Pemmeek
Felt	Libad	. . .	Neoo
House	Khanoo, Yana	. . .	Mal
Taste	Tiem	. . .	Taon
Sight	Dighin
Hearing	Beestin	. . .	Azhnaftin
Smell	Bien	. . .	Bu
Feeling	Dusta Pelmas
Sound, or Voice	Denk

LONDON:
PRINTED BY WILLIAM CLOWES AND SONS,
STAMFORD-STREET.

PREPARING FOR PUBLICATION,

BY

JAMES DUNCAN,

37 PATERNOSTER ROW.

X THE LIFE of JOHN JEBB, D.D., F.R.S., late Bishop of Limerick, Ardfert, and Aghadoe. With a Selection from his Letters. By the Rev. CHARLES FORSTER, B.D., formerly Domestic Chaplain to Bishop Jebb, Perpetual Curate of Ash-next-Sandwich, and one of the Six Preachers in the Cathedral of Christ, Canterbury. Two Vols. 8vo. with Portraits.

NARRATIVE of a RESIDENCE in KOORDISTAN, and on the SITE of ANCIENT NINEVEH, with Journal of a Voyage down the Tigris to Bagdad, and an Account of a Visit to Sheraz and Persepolis, with Maps and a Plan of Nineveh from original Observations, and numerous Illustrations. By the late CLAUDIUS JAMES RICH, Esq., the Honourable East India Company's Resident at Bagdad, author of "An Account of Ancient Babylon." In Two Vols. 8vo.

* * * This Work, long expected by all who knew the merits and acquirements of the lamented Author (and who, of the many connected with the literature and politics of Asia, did not know the name and lament the loss of that accomplished man?), is now published from his original MSS.

Koordistan is the portion of Western Asia which is, perhaps, the least known. Few Europeans have passed through, and none, it is believed, have printed any description of it. The embassy of Malcolm visited, but left it without enabling England and Europe to judge of their researches. Among the many countries into which Mr. Rich penetrated, Koordistan is that in which he took the greatest interest; and his narrative, though long delayed, contains the full and fresh impressions of his mind.—Nearly Ready.

THE DOCTRINE of ATONEMENT and SACRIFICE, evinced from the Scriptures, and confirmed from the Sacraments: Errors Considered, and Difficulties of Theists and Infidels Removed. By JOHN WHITLEY, D.D., Author of "The Scheme, &c. of Prophecy," "The Blood of Jesus Christ Cleanseth from all Sin." In One Vol. 8vo. boards.—Shortly.

X THIRTY YEARS' CORRESPONDENCE between JOHN JEBB, D.D., F.R.S., Bishop of Limerick, Ardfert, and Aghadoe, and ALEXANDER KNOX, Esq. M.R.I.A. Edited by the Rev. CHARLES FORSTER, B.D., Perpetual Curate of Ash-next-Sandwich, and one of the Six Preachers in the Cathedral of Christ, Canterbury, formerly Domestic Chaplain to Bishop Jebb. Two Vols. 8vo. Second Edition, with Translations of the Greek and Latin Passages, and an Index.—Nearly Ready.

X REMAINS of the late ALEXANDER KNOX, Esq. of Dublin, M.R.I.A., containing Letters and Essays on the Doctrines and Philosophy of Christianity, and the distinctive Character of the Church of England; with Portrait, from a Bust by Chantrey. Two Vols. 8vo.

THE HOLY BIBLE; containing the OLD and NEW TESTAMENTS, revised from Corrected Texts of the Original Tongues, and with former Translations diligently compared: with Critical and Explanatory Notes. By B. BOOTHROYD, D.D., Editor of the "Biblia Hebraica," &c. &c. Forming a volume, in imperial octavo, of 1280 pages. Price 30s. cloth.

The work announced comprises the Text of the Author's Family Bible and Improved Version, with such Corrections as a repeated and diligent perusal during the last ten years has suggested, aided by the many Biblical works which have been published since his own was completed. The results of the labours of the most eminent scholars and Biblical critics of past and present times, will here be found in a condensed form; by which infidel objections are in many instances satisfactorily obviated, and the judicious English reader will be enabled to perceive the sense, coherence, and beauty of the Holy Scriptures.

ESSAYS, THOUGHTS, and REFLECTIONS, and SERMONS on VARIOUS SUBJECTS. By the Rev. HENRY WOODWARD, A.M., formerly of Corpus Christi College, Oxford, Rector of Fethard, in the Diocese of Cashel. One Vol. 8vo. Second Edition. 12s. boards.

"The reverend author is a Christian philosopher, with a creed essentially Scriptural. * * The predominantly moral temperament of his mind, at once philosophical and practical, leads him ever * * * with the skill of a mental anatomist, and the spiritual experience of a Christian, to bring Christian principles and obligations to bear, with cutting conviction or resistless pathos, upon the conscience or the heart."—Christian Observer.

THE WHOLE WORKS of the Most Reverend Father in God, ROBERT LEIGHTON, D.D., Archbishop of Glasgow. To which is prefixed an entire new Life of the Author, by the Rev. J. N. PEARSON, M.A., of Trinity College, Cambridge, and Chaplain to the Most Noble the Marquess Wellesley. Four Vols. 8vo, with a Portrait, 36s. boards.

"We have placed a new edition of Archbishop Leighton's Works at the head of this article; and as Mr. Coleridge has neglected to furnish the biographical notice he had promised, we shall endeavour to supply its place by a few particulars of his life and writings, principally extracted from a spirited and eloquent Memoir prefixed to the new edition, by the Rev. Norman Pearson. It is a reproach to the present age, that his valuable writings, breathing as they do the sublimest and purest spirit of piety, rich in beautiful images and classical learning, throughout abounding in practical reflections, and all expressed with the sweetest and simplest eloquence, should have been neglected among us."—British Critic.

* * The above may be had, printed in a small but neat type, and compressed into Two Volumes, price 21s. boards.

By the same Author,

A PRACTICAL COMMENTARY upon the FIRST EPISTLE of ST. PETER, and other Expository Works. To which is prefixed an entire new Life of the Author, by the Rev. J. N. PEARSON, M.A. Trinity College, Cambridge, &c. Two Volumes 8vo, with Portrait, 18s. boards.

* * * Compressed into One Volume, 10s. 6d.

The WHOLE WORKS of the Right Rev. JEREMY TAYLOR, D.D., Lord Bishop of Down, Connor, and Dromore, with a Life of the Author, and a Critical Examination of his Writings. By the Right Rev. REGINALD HEBERT, D.D., late Lord Bishop of Calcutta. In 15 Volumes 8vo, new edition, price 9l. boards.

Also may be had separate, by the same Author,

HOLY LIVING and DYING; together with Prayers, containing the Whole Duty of a Christian, and the parts of Devotion fitted to all Occasions, and furnished for all Necessities. One Vol. small 8vo, 7s. boards.

* * This Edition has been carefully compared with the best octavo editions, all others of the same size printed of late years being deficient in the Notes and the numerous quotations of the Author.

A COURSE of SERMONS for all the SUNDAYS of the YEAR. Two Vols. 8vo, price 24s. boards.

The LIFE of the Right Rev. JEREMY TAYLOR. In One Vol. 8vo, with a Portrait, price 10s. 6d. boards.

PRACTICAL THEOLOGY; comprising Discourses on the Liturgy and Principles of the United Church of England and Ireland; critical and other Tracts; and a Speech delivered in the House of Peers in 1824. By JOHN JEBB, D.D., F.R.S., Bishop of Limerick, Ardfer, and Aghadoe. Two Vols. 8vo, 24s. boards.

"No work which has recently fallen into our hands more amply fulfils the promise of its title than that now before us."—Quarterly Theolog. Review.

By the same Author,

SACRED LITERATURE; comprising a Review of the Principles of Composition laid down by the late ROBERT LOWTH, D.D. Lord Bishop of London, in his Prelections, and Isaiah; and an application of the Principles so reviewed to the Illustration of the New Testament; in a Series of Critical Observations on the Style and Structure of that Sacred Volume. One Vol. 8vo. New Edition, 12s. boards.

SERMONS on Subjects chiefly Practical; with illustrative Notes, and an Appendix relating to the Character of the Church of England, as distinguished both from other Branches of the Reformation, and from the modern Church of Rome. Fourth Edition, corrected. One Vol. 8vo, 10s. 6d. boards.

PASTORAL INSTRUCTIONS on the CHARACTER and PRINCIPLES of the CHURCH of ENGLAND, selected from his former Writings. One Vol. 7s. boards.

Works edited by Bishop Jebb.

LIVES of SIR MATTHEW HALE and the EARL of ROCHESTER: With Characters of ARCHBISHOP LEIGHTON, The HON. ROBERT BOYLE, QUEEN MARY, and OTHER EMINENT PERSONS, and an ADDRESS to POSTERITY. By GILBERT BURNET, D.D., late Bishop of Sarum, with the Two Prefaces to the Dublin Editions. To which are now added, FIVE HITHERTO UNPUBLISHED LETTERS, by ANNE, Countess Dowager of Rochester, upon her Son's Last Illness and Conversion, Edited with an Introduction and Notes. Second Edition, in Foolscep 8vo, 7s. bds.

* * A few copies may still be had of the first edition in 8vo, price 10s. 6d.

THE PROTESTANT KEMPIS; or, PIETY without ASCETICISM: a Manual of Christian Faith and Practice, selected from the Writings of Scougal, Charles Howe, and Cudworth; with Corrections and occasional Notes. One Vol. 8vo, price 12s. boards.

PRACTICAL DISCOURSES: a Selection from the unpublished Manuscripts of the late Venerable THOMAS TOWNSON, D.D., Archdeacon of Richmond; one of the Rectors of Malpas, Cheshire; and some time Fellow of St. Mary Magdalen College, Oxford; with a Biographical Memoir, by Archdeacon CHURTON. Third Edition, in One Vol. 8vo, price 10s. 6d. bds.

THE REMAINS of WILLIAM PHELAN, D.D.; with a Biographical Memoir. Second Edition. Two Vols. 8vo, 21s. boards.

MAHOMETANISM UNVEILED; an Inquiry in which that Arch-Heresy, its Diffusion and Continuance, are examined on a new principle, tending to confirm the Evidences, and aid the Propagation of the Christian Faith. By the Rev. CHARLES FORSTER, B.D., Perpetual Curate of Ash-next-Sandwich, and one of the Six Preachers in the Cathedral of Christ, Canterbury, formerly Domestic Chaplain to Bishop Jebb.

A MEMOIR of the LIFE and PUBLIC SERVICES of SIR THOMAS STAMFORD RAFFLES, F.R.S. &c., particularly in the Government of Java, 1811-1816, and of Bencoolen and its Dependencies, 1817-1824; with Details of the Commerce and Resources of the Eastern Archipelago, and Selections from his Correspondence. With a Portrait and other Illustrations. By his Widow. New Edition, in Two Vols. 8vo, 24s. boards.

THE LAST DAYS of our LORD'S MINISTRY; a Course of Lectures delivered during Lent in Trinity Church, Coventry. By the Rev. WALTER FANQUHAR HOOK, M.A., Prebendary of Lincoln, Vicar of the Parish of the Holy Trinity, Coventry, and Chaplain in Ordinary to His Majesty. One Vol. 8vo, 10s. 6d. boards.

SIX SERMONS on the STUDY of the HOLY SCRIPTURES, their Nature, Interpretation, and some of their most important Doctrines, preached before the University of Cambridge. To which are annexed Two Dissertations; the first on the Reasonableness of the Orthodox Views of Christianity as opposed to the Rationalism of Germany; the second on the Interpretation of Prophecy generally, with an original Exposition of the Book of Revelation, shewing that the whole of that remarkable Prophecy has long ago been fulfilled. By the Rev. S. LEE, B.D., Regius Professor of Hebrew in the University of Cambridge. One Vol. 8vo, 14s. boards.

A SECOND COURSE of SERMONS for the YEAR; containing Two for each Sunday, and one for each Holyday; abridged from the most eminent Divines of the Established Church, and adapted to the Service of the Day: intended for the Use of Families and Schools. Dedicated, by permission, to the Lord Bishop of London. By the Rev. J. R. PITMAN, A.M., alternate Morning Preacher of Belgrave and Berkeley Chapels. In Two Vols. 8vo, 21s. boards.

"There is no question which the Clergy are more frequently asked, and to which they find it more difficult to give a satisfactory reply than this—What Sermons would they recommend for the use of a private family? There are so many circumstances which render the greater part of modern discourses totally unfit for the purposes of domestic instruction, and the old standards, unmodernised, are so little intelligible to common ears, that it is no easy matter to point out any set of discourses embracing a sufficient variety to excite attention, at the same time forcibly inculcating the pure doctrines and practical precepts of Christianity. We really think that Mr. Pitman's work bids fair to supply the deficiency which has been so much regretted."—Quarterly Theolog. Review.

* * A Third Edition, revised throughout, of the FIRST COURSE, is just published, same size and price as above.

The WORKS of the Right Rev. WILLIAM BEVERIDGE, D.D., Lord Bishop of St. Asaph, now first collected: with a Memoir of the Author, and a Critical Examination of his Writings, by the Rev. THOMAS HARTWELL HORNE, B.D., of St. John's College, Cambridge; Author of the "Introduction to the Holy Scriptures." In Nine Vols. 8vo, with a Portrait, uniform with the Works of Bishop Taylor, 5l. 8s. boards.

A THEOLOGICAL DICTIONARY; containing Definitions of all Religious Terms; a comprehensive View of every Article in the System of Divinity; an impartial Account of all the principal Denominations which have subsisted in the Religious World from the Birth of Christ to the present Day: together with an accurate Statement of the most remarkable Transactions and Events recorded in Ecclesiastical History. By the late Rev. CHARLES BUCK. Seventh Edition, corrected and greatly extended, by the Rev. E. HENDERSON, D.D., Professor of Divinity in Highbury College. One very large Vol. 8vo, 18s.

* * The number of additional articles in the present Edition amounts to nearly Five Hundred.—Vide Preface.

A SHORT HISTORY of the CHRISTIAN CHURCH, from its Erection at Jerusalem down to the Present Time. Designed for the Use of Schools, Families, &c. By the Rev. JOHN FRY, B.A., Rector of Desford, in Leicestershire. One Vol. 8vo, 12s. boards.

"His matter is unquestionably selected with judgment, and luminously arranged; his language is clear and concise, and not deficient in elegance; and we rise from the perusal of his work with very favourable impressions of his character, with which otherwise we are unacquainted."—Theological Review.

"To such readers as wish for an Ecclesiastical History, written on the model of Milner's, and animated by the same spirit, Mr. F.'s work will be highly acceptable, particularly as it is complete, and comprised within a single volume."—Eclectic Review.

By the same Author,

OBSERVATIONS on the UNFULFILLED PROPHECIES of SCRIPTURE, which are yet to have their Accomplishment before the coming of the Lord in Glory, or at the Establishment of his Everlasting Kingdom. One Vol. 8vo. 10s. 6d. boards.

A NEW TRANSLATION and EXPOSITION of the very Ancient BOOK OF JOB; with Notes, explanatory and philological. One Vol. 8vo, 12s. boards.

LECTURES, Explanatory and Practical, on the EPISTLE of ST. PAUL to the ROMANS. Second Edition, One Vol. 8vo, 12s. boards.

CANTICLES; or, SONG OF SOLOMON: a new Translation, with Notes, and an Attempt to interpret the Sacred Allegories contained in that Book; to which is added, an Essay on the Name and Character of the Redeemer. One Vol. 8vo. Second Edition, 6s. boards.

The PRACTICAL WORKS of the REV. RICHARD BAXTER, with a Life of the Author, and a Critical Examination of his Writings. By the Rev. WILLIAM ORME. In Twenty-three Vols. 8vo, with finely engraved Portrait, 12l. 12s. boards.

Also may be had separate,

The LIFE and TIMES of RICHARD BAXTER, with a Critical Examination of his Writings. By the Rev. WILLIAM ORME. In Two Vols. 8vo, with finely engraved Portrait, 1l. 1s. boards.

CHRISTIAN RECORDS; or, a Short and Plain History of the CHURCH of CHRIST: containing the Lives of the Apostles; an Account of the Sufferings of Martyrs; the Rise of the Reformation, and the present State of the Christian Church. By the Rev. THOMAS SIMS, M.A. Fifth Edition. One Volume, 18mo, with a beautiful Frontispiece, 3s. 6d. boards.

"Every Protestant child and young person should be generally acquainted with the outline of the history of the Church of Christ, and for this purpose we cannot recommend a better manual than that before us."—Christian Observer.

• • This little Volume has been in part translated into the modern Greek and Chinese languages, by the Rev. Mr. JOWETT and Dr. MILNE; and the Author has received a Letter from the Right Rev. Dr. CORRIE, Bishop of Madras, dated Ship Exmouth, 21 June, 1835, with the following intimation:

"I have by me, and intend to have printed, please God I arrive at Madras, the whole of Christian Records translated into Hindoostance. This language is used by Mahomedans all over India, and understood by most Hindoos."

DIVINE PROVIDENCE; or, the Three Cycles of Revelation; shewing the perfect parallelism, civil and religious, of the Patriarchal, Jewish, and Christian Eras; the whole forming a new Evidence of the Divine Origin of Christianity. By the Rev. GEORGE CROLY, LL.D., Rector of St. Stephen's, Walbrook, London. One Vol. 8vo, 15s. bds.

An INQUIRY into the MODERN PREVAILING NOTIONS respecting that FREEDOM of WILL which is supposed to be Essential to Moral Agency, Virtue and Vice, Reward and Punishment, Praise and Blame. By JONATHAN EDWARDS, A.M. With an Introductory Essay by the Author of "Natural History of Enthusiasm." One Vol. 8vo, 12s.; or in One Vol. 12mo, 8s. 6d. boards.

"The author of Natural History of Enthusiasm has already taken his station among the most influential, as well as the most truly philosophical, writers of the day; and his present performance, whatever attention it may meet with, we cannot but regard as the most valuable service which he has yet rendered to the cause of truth and Scriptural piety."
—Eclectic Review.

"And now, having brought to a close our review of this very beautiful Essay, we cordially and confidently recommend it to our philosophical readers as an uncommonly able and eloquent performance."—Presbyterian Review.

BIBLIA HEBRAICA, secundum ultimam editionem JOS. ATHIE, a JOHANNE LEUSDEN denno recognitam, recensita, atque ad Masoram, et correctiores, Bombergi, Stephani, Plantini, aliorumque editiones, exquisite adornata, variisque notis illustrata. Ab EVERARDO VAN DER HOOCHT, V.D.M. Editio nova, recognita, et emendata, a JUDAH D'ALLEMAND. New Edition, in One Volume, on fine paper (1,200 pages), price 21s. boards; and on inferior paper, but very superior to any Foreign Edition, 15s. boards.

"The most correct Edition of the Hebrew Scriptures is the last reprint of Van der Hoocht's Hebrew Bible, which has been revised by Professor Hurwitz."—Journal of Education.

A GRAMMAR of the HEBREW LANGUAGE; comprised in a Series of Lectures, compiled from the best Authorities, and augmented with much Original Matter, drawn principally from Oriental Sources; designed for the Use of Students in the Universities. By the Rev. S. LEE, B.D.; D.D. of the University of Halle; Honorary Member of the Asiatic Society of Paris; Honorary Associate and F.R.S.L. and M.R.A.S. &c. &c.; and Regius Professor of Hebrew in the University of Cambridge. Second Edition. One Vol. 8vo, 14s. boards.

* Professor LEE is preparing (and nearly ready) for publication a HEBREW and ENGLISH DICTIONARY, in One large Vol. 8vo.

AN ANALYSIS of the TEXT of the HISTORY of JOSEPH, upon the Principle of Professor LEE's HEBREW GRAMMAR, and adapted to the Second Edition of it. By the Rev. ALEXANDER OLLIVANT, M.A. F.C.P.S., late Fellow of Trinity College, Cambridge, Vice-Principal of St. David's College, and one of the Examining Chaplains to the Lord Bishop of St. David's. Second Edition, in One Vol. 8vo, 6s. boards.

ELEMENTS of HEBREW GRAMMAR (without Points). To which is prefixed a Dissertation on the Two Modes of Reading, with or without Points. By CHARLES WILSON, D.D., late Professor of Church History in the University of St. Andrew's. Fifth Edition, in One Vol. 8vo, price 10s. 6d.

A HEBREW PRIMER ; intended as an Introduction to the Spelling and Reading of Hebrew with the Points, compiled for the use of children and beginners.' By the Rev. A. M'CAUL, A.M., of Trinity College, Dublin. Second Edition. In octavo, 1s. 6d.

LIBER PSALMORUM : ad Editionem Hooghtianem accuratissime adornatus. 3s. boards.

THE AJAX of SOPHOCLES, illustrated by English Notes. By the Rev. J. R. PITMAN, A.M., alternate Morning Preacher of Belgrave and Berkeley Chapels. One Vol. 8vo, 9s. bds.

The Editor has endeavoured to comprise in the notes the most useful remarks of all the commentators on this play, and has made numerous references to the works of modern critics, by whom the force, either of single words or of idiomatical expressions, has been illustrated.

JOURNALS of EXCURSIONS in the ALPS. By WILLIAM BROCKEDON, Author of "Illustrations of Passes of the Alps," &c. One Vol. 8vo, 10s. 6d. boards.

"Mr. Brockedon knows how to wield the pen as well as the pencil."—Spectator.

HISTORY PHILOSOPHICALLY ILLUSTRATED, from the Fall of the Roman Empire to the French Revolution. By GEORGE MILLER, D.D., M.R.I.A., formerly Fellow of Trinity College, Dublin. Four Vols. 8vo, 2l. 2s. boards.

"His work possesses a unity of subject, harmony of proportion, and connexion of parts, that render it not merely the best modern history in our language, but the only one from which a student can obtain a systematic view of the progress of civilization. Another merit of Dr. Miller's work is, that it necessarily leads to the consideration of the important historical problem to which we have more than once referred,—the operation of opinion upon action."—Foreign Quarterly Review, January 1836.

AN ESSAY upon NATIONAL CHARACTER ; being an Inquiry into some of the principal Causes which contribute to form and modify the Character of Nations in the state of Civilization. By RICHARD CHENEVIX, Esq. F.R.S.L. and E.M.R.I.A. &c. Two Vols. 8vo, 28s. boards.

A HISTORY of BRITISH ANIMALS, exhibiting the descriptive Characters and systematical Arrangement of the Genera and Species of Quadrupeds, Birds, Reptiles, Fishes, Mollusca, and Radiata, of the United Kingdom ; including the Indigenous, Extirpated, and Extinct Kinds ; together with Periodical and Occasional Visitants. By JOHN FLEMING, D.D., F.R.S.E., M.W.S., &c., and Author of the "Philosophy of Zoology." One Vol. 8vo, 18s. boards.

"This very important work, which has just appeared, we consider as infinitely superior to any Natural History of British Animals hitherto published. It will become the standard book on British Animals."—Jamieson's Journal of Science.

ELEMENTS of CONCHOLOGY, according to the Linnæan System ; illustrated by Twenty-eight Plates, drawn from Nature. By the Rev. E. I. BRUNOW, A.M., &c. Third Edition, One Vol. 8vo, 16s. boards ; or beautifully coloured by Sowerby, 1l. 11s. 6d. boards.

HISTORY of MORAL SCIENCE. By ROBERT BLAKEY.

Second Edition. One Vol, 8vo, 12s. boards.

"The example of Mr. Blakey is one that we hope to see followed in every theory. He has been more anxious to point out the good than the evil; and his defence of many whose character has been maligned is as generous as it is triumphant."—Athenæum.

"To meet a desideratum, which not only the general and intelligent, but the learned and philosophical reader must feel, Mr. Blakey has here produced a work of great utility; but the great value of this book will be found in the mass of information it contains respecting men and subjects very frequently referred to without being well understood."—Literary Gazette.

By the same Author,

An ESSAY TOWARDS an EASY and USEFUL SYSTEM of LOGIC. One Vol. 12mo, 4s. 6d. boards.

TABLES of INTEREST, at 3, 4, 4½, and 5 per Cent, from 1l. to 10,000l., and from 1 to 365 days, in a regular progression of single days; with Tables at all the above rates from 1 to 12 months, and from 1 to 10 years. By JOHN THOMSON, Accountant in Edinburgh. One Volume, 12mo, Tenth Edition, 8s. bound.

A TREATISE on the FUNCTIONAL and STRUCTURAL CHANGES of the LIVER in the PROGRESS of DISEASE; and on the Agency of Hepatic Derangement in producing other Disorders. With numerous cases, exhibiting the Invasion, Symptoms, Progress, and Treatment of Hepatic Disease in India. By W. E. E. CONWELL, Surgeon of the Madras Establishment, Docteur en Médecine de la Faculté à Paris, &c. In One Vol. 8vo. 14s. boards.

J. DUNCAN having purchased the whole remaining Copies of the under-mentioned Works, is enabled to offer them, for a limited time, at the low prices affixed.

PLATONIS OPERA OMNIA; recensuit et Commentariis Scholiisque illustravit IMMANUEL BEKKERUS. Accedunt Virorum Doctorum Heindorf, Wyttenbach, Ast, Buttmann, Gottlebe, Pindeisen, Serrani, Routh, Stallbaum, Nitzsch, Heusde, Fischer, Boeckh, Lange, Nurnburger, Stutzmann, F. A. Wolf, aliorumque Annotationes Textui subjectæ, Versio Latina, et Timæi Lexicon Vocum Platoniarum. In Eleven Vols. 8vo, price 7l. 14s., or on large paper. royal 8vo (of which only 150 copies are printed), price 11l. 11s. extra boards.

This beautiful Edition has received the highest encomiums from the late Professor Dobree, and many other eminent British and Continental Scholars, and is the only Variorum one hitherto published: it contains the whole of the Greek Text, revised and amended from manuscripts now first collated or used in any edition of Plato; the Latin Translation of Ficinus; the Greek Scholia; the Annotations, either entire or select, of the different Commentators on the Text of Plato, or the Works attributed to him; a Reprint of the Lexicon Platonicum of Timæus, as edited by Ruhnken; the whole preceded by Fischer's Literary Notice of the Life and Writings of Plato. Bekker's Text and Scholia are used, and such typographical errors are corrected as had escaped the Editor's vigilance.

The spirited Projector of this fine Classic intended to publish it at 10l. 10s. for the small, and 18l. 18s. for the large paper; but it is now offered at the above-mentioned reduced prices.

EURIPIDIS OPERA OMNIA. In Nine Vols. 8vo, small paper, 10l. 10s., now offered for 6l. 6s.; large paper, 18l. 18s., now offered for 10l. 10s.

THE WORKS of Dr. JOHN TILLOTSON, Archbishop of Canterbury, with LIFE. In Ten Vols. 8vo, 5l. 5s., now offered for 3l. 10s.

PATRICK, LOWTH, and ARNOLD'S COMMENTARIES on the OLD and NEW TESTAMENTS. In Six Vols. royal 4to, price 12l. 12s., now offered for 9l. 9s.

University of Toronto
Library

DO NOT REMOVE THE CARD
FROM THIS POCKET

Acme Library Card Pocket
LOWE-MARTIN CO. LIMITED

